A few years before the battle of Knocktaunh an extraordinary instance of civic justice occurred in this town, which, in the eyes of its citizens, elevated their chief magistrate to a rank with the inflexible Roman. At that period, Pius Stephen, an opulent merchant, was mayor of Galway in 1495. He had made several voyages to Spain, as a considable interchange was then kept up between that country and the western coast of Ireland. When returning from his last visit he brought with him the son of a respectable merchant named Gomez, whose hospitality he had largely experienced, and who was now received by his family with all the warmth of affection which from the earliest period has characterized the natives of Ireland. Young Gomez soon became the intimate associate of Walter Lynch, the only son of the mayor, a youth in his twenty-first year, and who possessed qualities of mind and body which rendered him an object of general admiration; but in those was unhappily united a disposition of libertinism, which was the source of the greatest affliction to his father. The worthy magistrate, however, was now led to entertain hopes of a favorable change in his son's character as he was engaged in paying honorable addresses to a beautiful young lady of good family and fortune. Preparatory to the nuptials the mayor gave a splendid entertainment, at which young Lynch fancied his betrothed bride viewed his Spanish friend with too much regard. The fire of jealousy was instantly lighted up in his distempered brain, and at their next interview he accused his beloved Agnes of infidelitbetween him and Gomez. Irritated at his injustice, the offended fair one disdained to deny the charge, and the lovers parted in anger.

On the following night, while Walter Lynch slowly passed the residence of his fancied betrayer, he observed young Gomez in the house, as he had been invited by her father to spend the evening with him. All his suspicions now received the most decisive confirmation, and in a maddened fury he rushed on his unsuspecting friend, who, alarmed by a voice which the frantic rage of his partner prevented him from recognizing, fled towards a solitary quarter of the town near the shore. Lynch maintained the full pursuit till his victim had nearly reached the water's edge, when he overtook him, darted a poniard into his heart, and plunged his body, bleeding, into the sea, which, during the night, threw it back again upon the shore, where it was found and recognised on the following morning.

The wretched murderer, after contemplating for a moment the deed of horror he had perpetrated, sought to hide himself in the recesses of an adjoining wood, where he passed the night, a prey to all those conflicting feelings which the loss of that happiness he had so ardently expected, and a sense of guilt of the deepest dye, could inflict. At length found some degree of consolation in the firm resolution of surrendering himself to the law, as the only means now left him of expiating the dreadful crime which he had committed against society. With this determination he bent his steps towards the town at the earliest dawn of the following morning; but he had scarcely reached the precincts when he met a crowd approaching, amongst whom, with sheme and terror, he observed his father on horseback, attended by several officers of justice. At present the venerable magistrate had no suspicion that his only son was the assassin of his friend and guest; but when young Lynch proclaimed himself the murderer, a conflict of feelings seized the wretched father beyond the power of language to describe. To him, the chief magistrate of the town, was entrusted the power of life and death. For a moment the strong affection of a parent pleaded in his breast in behalf of his erstwhile son; but this quickly gave place to a sense of his duty in his magisterial capacity as an impartial dispenser of the laws. The latter feeling at length predominated, and though he now perceived the cup of earthly bliss was about to be forever dashed from his lips, he resolved to sacrifice all personal consideration to his love of justice, and ordered the guard to secure his prisoner.

The sad procession moved slowly towards the prison amidst a concourse of spectators, some of whom expressed the strongest admiration at the upright conduct of the magistrate, while others were equally loud in their lamentations for the unhappy fate of a highly-accomplished youth who had long been a universal favorite. But the firmness of the mayor had to withstand a still greater shock, when the mother, sisters, and intended bride of the wretched Walter beheld him who had been their hope and pride approach pale, bound, and surrounded by guards. Their frantic exclaims affected every heart except that of the inflexible magistrate, who had now resolved to sacrifice life, with all that makes life valuable, rather than swerve from the path of duty.

In a few days the trial of Walter Lynch took place, and in a provincial town of Ireland, unstained at that period not more than three thousand inhabitants, a father was behold sitting in judgment, like another Brutus, on his only son; and, like him, condemning that son to die as a sacrifice to public justice. Yet the trial of the firmness of the upright and inflexible magistrate did not end here. His was a virtue too refined for vulgar minds; the populace loudly demanded the prisoner's release, and were only prevented by the guards from demolishing the prison and the mayor's house, which adjoined it; and their fury was increased on hearing that the unhappy prisoner had now become anxious for life. To these ebullitions of popular rage were added the intercession of numerous friends, with wealth and influence in Galway, and the entreaties of his dearest relatives and friends; but while Lynch stood firm against the pleadings of a father and a man placed in his singularly distressing circumstances, he unhesitatingly declared that the law should take its course.

On the night preceding the fatal day appointed for the execution of Walter Lynch, this extraordinary man entered the dungeon of his son, holding in his hand a lamp, and accompanied by a priest. He locked the gate after him, kept the keys fast in his hand, and then seated himself in a recess in the wall. The wretched culprit drew near, and, with a faltering tongue, asked if he had anything to hope. The mayor answered, "No, my son; your life is forfeited to the laws, and at sunrise you must die! I have prayed for your prosperity; but this is at an end; with this world you have done forever. Were any other but your wretched father your judge I might have dropped a tear over my childs misfortune and solicited for his life, even though stained with murder. But you must die. There are the last drops which shall quench the sparks of nature; and, if you dare hope, implore that heaven may not shut the gates of mercy on the destroyer of his fellow-creature. I am now come to join with this good man in petitioning God to give you such composure as will enable you to meet your fate, even with becoming resignation." After this affecting address he called on the clergyman to offer up their united prayers for God's forgiveness to his unhappy son, and that he might be fully fortified to meet the approaching catastrophe. In those moments of anguish at the throne of mercy the youthful culprit joined with fervor, and spoke of life and its concerns no more.

Day had scarcely broken when the signal of preparation was heard outside the prison without. The father rose and assisted the executioner to remove the fetters which bound his unfortunate son. Then, unlocking the door, he placed him between the priest and himself, leaning upon an arm of each. In this manner he ascended a flight of steps lined with soldiers, and was passing on to gain the street when a new trial assailed the magistrate, for which he appeared not to have been unprepared. His wretched wife, whose name was Blake, failing in her personal exertions to save the life of her son, had gone in distraction to the heads of her own family, and prevailed on them for the honor of their house, to rescue him from ignominy. They flew to arms, and a prodigious concourse assembled to support them, whose counsels for mercy to the culprit would have shaken any nerve less firm than those of the mayor of Galway. He exhorted them to yield submission to the laws of their country; but finding all his efforts fruitless to accomplish the ends of justice at the accustomed place and by the usual hands, he, desperate victory over parental feelings, resolved himself to perform the sacrifice which he had vowed to pay on its altar. Intimidated by a firm and unfortunate son, he mounted with him by a winding stair within the building that led to an arched window overlooking the street, which was filled with the populace. Here he appeared the end of the rope, which had been previously fixed around the neck of his son, to an iron staple which projected from the wall, and, amid the tears falling from his last embrace, he launched him into eternity.

The intrepid magistrate expected instant death from the fury of the populace, but the people seemed so much overwhelmed or confounded by the magnanimous act that they retired slowly and silently to their respective dwellings. The innocent cause of this and tragedy is said to have died soon after of grief, and the unhappy father of Walter Lynch to have secluded himself during the remainder of his life from all society, except that of his mourning family. His house still exists in Lombard street, Galway, which is yet known by the name of "Dead Man's Lane, and over the front doorway are to be seen a skull and cross-bones executed in black marble, with the motto, "Remember Death, vanity of vanity, and all is but vanity."

The Fate of the First Persecutor of the Church.

King Agrippa was the first persecutor of the Church. After having put to death St. James, first Bishop of Jerusalem, he imprisoned St. Peter, but God delivered him out of his hands. Shortly after this, the king felt the effects of the divine vengeance. After the Feast of the Passover, he departed to Cesarea, to exhibit the public games in honor of Claudius Cesar, and was attended by a numerous train of the most distinguished persons of his own and neighboring nations. He appeared on the second morning of the shows at the theatre, in a costly robe of silver tissue, artfully wrought, and so bright, that the sunbeams which darted upon it were reflected with such an uncommon brilliancy as to dazzle the eyes of the spectators. He addressed the Tyrians and Sidonians, who had come to ask forgiveness of some offence, in a lengthy and pompous speech, and, while he spoke, the ambassadors, and his own court-sycophants, gave vent to their admiration in acclamations, crying out that it was the voice of a god, and not of a man. The king, too sensible of the people's praise, and elated with pride, seemed to forget himself, and to approve instead of rebuking their flattery. But, at that moment the angel of the Lord smote him with a fearful disease, and he felt a violent pain in his bowels. After lingering five days in the most excruciating pain, being eaten up with worms, he expired in the greatest misery.

—The Holy Father has written, through Cardinal Jacobini, to Mgr. Joseph Doutreloux, Bishop of Liege, sympathising with his Lordship on the floods which have ravaged the provinces of Liege and Limburg, and as a sterling proof thereof enclosed a contribution of £50 for the relief of the afflicted people. Simultaneously the Holy Father addressed a letter to the Bishop of Namur, enclosing to his Lordship £40, to be used in his diocese in alleviation of the hardships the floods have inflicted there. The diocese is much touched by the Pope's paternal solicitude.

THE MANNINGS.

Brothers of Different Belief.

The death of Mr. Charles John Manning, the elder brother of Cardinal Manning, at the great age of 82, is suggestive of the religious differences which so often separate brothers who lisp in childhood the same prayers at a mother's knee and learn the same doctrine at school and college. The late Mr. C. J. Manning, eldest son of Wm. Manning, a member of Parliament and one of the governors of the Bank of England, was a staunch Church of England man to his death, and one of his latest acts was the building and endowment of a beautiful Protestant church. How strange to his mind must have seemed the secession of his brother Henry Edward, who, when rector of Lavington and Archdeacon of Chichester, was one of the most learned controversialists against Rome! The Mannings were nearly related to the Wilberforces, whose strange differences in religion were of the same kind. Of the four sons of Wm. Wilberforce three became Roman Catholics. Two of them, Robert Isaac, the Archdeacon of the East Riding of Yorkshire, and Henry William, the Vicar of East Farleigh, Kent, were among the most talented of the Oxford Tractarians, the "Ritualists" of those days. Samuel, Bishop successively of Oxford and Winchester, was lord of the manor of Lavington, of which Manning was rector. They had married two sisters in early life, daughters of the late Rev. John Sargent, of that parish. They were much attached to each other, and Samuel Wilberforce tried his influence with the queen to get Manning made a bishop.

Other remarkable instances that occur to us in connection with the death of Cardinal Manning's Protestant elder brother as illustrative of the religious differences of members of the same family, are the two Newmans, the two Froudes, the two Arnolds, and the two Dales, Thomas Pelham Dale is now a Ritualist martyr in Holloway Jail, while his younger brother was, for many years, the legal adviser of "The Church Association," which, by paying the costs of his prosecution, has put him there. John Henry Newman is now a Roman cardinal; his brother, Francis William, a theist, with some Communistic tendencies. The late Richard Hurrell Froude was an extreme Anglo Catholic, and would, no doubt, have submitted to Rome but for his early death. His brother, James Anthony, the historian, is a free thinker, who resigned his English curacy from unbelief in the Dogmas required of him, as he explains in his "Nemesis of Faith." Matthew Arnold is the most pronounced of religious free-thinkers, while his brother Thomas is a Roman Catholic, who a few years since only returned to the Church of England to hurry back again to Rome, just as Father Bitthorpe so often did. When one sees an infant baptized it is curious to speculate how long, after he is grown up, he is going to be of thinking for himself he will retain the faith that he is baptized into, and where on the theological map he will at last be found. —Eagle.

A New Fashion in Funerals.

An Innovation that has Several Proper and Interesting Features.

A new fashion, destined yet to become popular, is being quietly introduced into the funerals of New York. For years, the press and pulpit have shown the folly of expending large sums of money on coffins, flowers, and carriage processions. While a considerable outlay may not affect well-to-do people, the poor, always desirous of following "the style" as far as possible, imitate the pomp and extravagance to a degree that is positively injurious.

In many American cities, the Catholic clergy have attempted to check the increasing disposition to make a show by limiting the number of carriages to two, four, or six, according to the circumstances of the family; and Funeral Reform Associations have been a feature of social life in London and several other large cities of England for years.

The fashion of putting after cards of invitations to funerals the words, "It is requested that no flowers be sent," was a step in the way of funeral reform; and the more recent adopted announcement, "Interment at the convenience of the family," was another important one. The innovations have reduced considerably the cost of funerals, the last being particularly appreciated by rich and poor alike, as constituting an effectual barrier against the professional mourners, who attended all possible funerals for the sole purpose of having a ride to the cemetery and back.

While it has been frequently remarked of our business men that they drive through everything as if they had not a single moment to spare, even to die, it sometimes becomes evident that they have not the time to attend the funeral of a partner, a friend, or an esteemed public servant. To the men who belong to secret benevolent societies and trade organizations, a funeral of an associate, in the morning or afternoon, involves the loss at least of a half day's work; and because there are thousands who cannot afford this pecuniary sacrifice, the remains of men, who in life counted their friends by the hundred, are not infrequently followed to the grave by a dozen or less comrades.

The latest innovation gives all the friends of a deceased person an opportunity for participating in appropriate ceremonies. It will do away with the necessity, whether real or assumed, for hiring a long string of coaches to accompany the body to the grave. The new fashion provides simply for holding funeral services in the evening. Business men, society men, employers, and employees can then attend without losing a moment of office or factory time. In the morning the remains, accompanied by the immediate family, may be taken to the place of interment and laid at rest.

MOUNT ST. MARY'S COLLEGE.

Particulars of its Financial Troubles.

In the MONITOR of a few weeks ago we announced the rumor that the historical Catholic institution known as Mount St. Mary's, Emmitsburg, was about to suspend in consequence of financial embarrassments. The following account received by mail gives full particulars:

FREDERICK, Md. February 29.—A petition was filed in the Circuit Court yesterday by Joshua Biggs and others, asking that a trustee be appointed to dispose of the property of Mount St. Mary's College, whose buildings stand on the eastern slope of the Catoctin mountain, near Emmitsburg, and twenty miles north of Frederick. The petition was a surprise to every one acquainted with the history of the venerable institution, which is one of the oldest in the United States, as it had heretofore been considered to be in a highly prosperous condition. The annual income from students alone is estimated at nearly $40,000, and no limit of financial embarrassment has ever before been heard." The petition for the trustee sets forth that the petitioners believe the College to be unable to pay its debts, and that, for the benefit of its creditors, it should be sold. Judge Lynch of the Circuit Court, after hearing a statement from the counsel of the petitioners, granted the application, and appointed Capt. James McSherry trustee. The liabilities amount to nearly $200,000. Among the creditors are the First National Bank of Hanover, $43,000; Gettysburg National Bank, $2,000 Richard Marshall of Frederick, about $20,000; Randolph C. Nichols of Frederick, $2,000; Colonel Richard Martin, $20,000; Henry Jerome of Frederick, $1,500, and a large number of other small claims. The fact that many of the claims are secured by mortgages and other encumbrances, and that in one case, the claim of Mr. Nichols, the security was a mortgage on the personal property of the College, is regarded as indicate that the financial condition of the College for some years has been most deplorable, despite the supposition to the contrary.

Within just St. Mary's College was established in 1808 by the Rev. John Dubois, a Roman Catholic priest and an exile from France, who landed at Norfolk, Va., in 1791, and soon after joined the Order of St. Sulpice. The first college building was a row of long log houses, and during the next year there were only seven pupils. Under the direction of Mr. Dubois the construction of a massive stone building was begun in 1822, and had nearly approached completion when, on the morning of June 7, 1824, it was entirely destroyed by fire. Mr. Dubois at once began the work of rebuilding, and contributions were received from all quarters. In 1826 the school was opened in a new building, and soon afterward the founder was appointed Bishop of New York, and was succeeded by the Rev. Simon Gabriel Brute. The institution was invested with the power of granting degrees by the General Assembly of Maryland in 1830. The Rev. Mr. Brute was succeeded by the Rev. Mr. De Bourg Egan, but declining health interrupted the latter's labors, and the Rev. John B. Hemet succeeded to the management. This distinguished prelate was soon afterward appointed Bishop of Cincinnati, and was succeeded by the Rev. John McCaffrey, F. B. Jameson, Thomas Butler, John McCloskey, and J. A. Watterson, in the order given, being the alumni are Cardinal McCloskey, the late Archbishop Purcell of Cincinnati, Bishop Carroll of Kentucky, Elder of Tennessee, Loughlin of Brooklyn, McFarland of Hartford, and Watterson, Coadjutor of Cleveland.

Capt. Jas. McSherry, the trustee, to night made the following statement of the difficulties which led to his appointment: "The trouble of the college originated with the outbreak of the war, when it was cut off from all communication with the South, its main support. During the succeeding four years the faculty were compelled to keep it open, although the number of pupils was greatly diminished, and the greater portion of the debts was then accumulated. For over thirty years the Rev. John McCloskey was the treasurer of the college, and although I have the greatest appreciation of the character of that gentleman he evidently was totally ignorant of financial matters. It was his policy to keep expenditures close to pay another, and altogether the finances were very badly managed. Upon the death of Father McCloskey last fall matters were brought to a crisis, although had he lived they would probably have kept the college afloat for some time by his unwise policy. When the Rev. Father W. J. Hill of Brooklyn assumed the Presidency last fall, he, of course, instituted an inquiry into the finances of the college, and found that they were hopelessly tangled. Father Hill is a sound business man, soon saw the only way was to close up matters, and the proceedings were taken yesterday with his full knowledge and consent. The petitioners were Joshua Biggs, whose claim was for $6,000, and Noah Walker & Co., of Baltimore, for $1,500.

The trustee says that in order to ascertain the liabilities of the college he had to inquire of outside parties, as the books were so mixed that they did not show anything. He thinks that the assets will not amount to over thirty per cent. of the liabilities.

A rumor reached here this afternoon that the students had broken into rebellion, but owing to the interruption of telegraphic communication no details could be learned. Capt. McSherry said that he had heard nothing of the trouble, and could not imagine any cause for dissatisfaction among the students.

BALTIMORE, Feb. 27.—A special from Emmittsburg says the graduating class of the college has rebelled, left the premises, and lodged at a hotel in the adjacent village.

Hints to Parents.

Few parents realize how much their children may be taught at home by devoting a few minutes to the instruction of them every day. Let a parent make a comparison of his child, conversing with him familiarly, put to him questions, explain the meaning of cute facts, the result of his readings or observations, awaken his curiosity, explain difficulties, the meaning of things, and all this in an easy playful manner, without seeming to impose a task, and he will be astonished at the progress which will be made. The experiment is so simple that none need to hesitate about its performance.

THE HOLY WAY OF THE CROSS.

BY CHARLES WARREN STODDARD.

The Stations of the Cross in all our churches are the bulwarks of our faith; so long as we are within that mysterious circle we are safe. Come, let us go up into that Holy Land and fulfill our duties as pilgrims and crusaders. St. Stephen's Gate, so called from the stoning of the Martyr close upon it, faces Gethsemane and the Mount of Olives. It is known by the native Christians of the Holy Land as the "Gate of Our Lady Mary," because before it, over against Gethsemane, is the tomb of the Blessed Virgin.

At this Gate, where the guard shows a foot print of Christ in the guard-room, begins the Via Dolorosa, that street of pain, every stone of which was washed with tears —not by the tears of pilgrims who brave sun and storm to tread the streets of the Holy City, but by the sufferings because of the faithful, who have again and again been prostrated in sorrowful commiseration before the sacred pictures that represent our Lord's passion and death.

The Via Dolorosa is narrow and ill-paved, like all the streets of Jerusalem. It is painful to walk over the sharp and slippery stones; it is sometimes dangerous to ride over them, for the badly-shod beasts are always sliding forward or backward, and a fall on such a pavement would be a very serious affair.

Upon entering the street you see immediately to the left the gloomy walls of the barracks: Turkish soldiers, handsome, but insolent fellows, throug the windows and hang about the doors; wild, discordant music, high-keyed bugles, and shrill clarions that cut the air like knives; the very winds, resound through the great halls. The ancient castle of Antonia, that formerly stood here, sprang out of the ruins of the Praetorium, the residence of Pilate; a portion of the original structure still remains, and here, surrounded by jeering infidels, is a small chapel; it marks the spot where Jesus, having been scourged and crowned with thorns, was condemned to an ignominious death. It is the

FIRST STATION.

Adoramus te, etc.

Three paces distant He was nailed to the cross. At the

ELEVENTH STATION.

But a step farther, for the cross must have been lying with its feet upon the socket in the rock, or that when it was raised it slipped at once into it, there He died! It is the TWELFTH STATION.

Adoramus te, etc.

At the foot of that cross, where His body was received, is the THIRTEENTH STATION.

Adoramus te, etc.

And yonder, under the great dome of the church, is the Sepulchre where He was laid —the

FOURTEENTH STATION.

Adoramus te, etc.

This is the pilgrimage which can be made daily in any chapel in the land. One needs only to have the spirit of a crusader to follow that Way of Pain with a heart ready to breaking, and with eyes dimmed with tears. Yet, who that hath a heart and is not ashamed of tears may not walk the holy way of the cross, crying, "Our feet shall stand within thy gates, O Jerusalem!"

EIGHTH STATION.

Adoramus te, etc.

Here ends the Via Dolorosa. Thus far the stations have been discovered in the most natural manner; they are not prominent; they are not at equal distances from one another; the paroxysms of grief that beset our Lord on that awful passage from the scourging to the cross were such as must befall any innocent victim of the public rage. Doubtless there have been moments when His progress was stayed by the fury of the mob; moments when His faltering feet were hastened by the support of those who were ready and willing to suffer for Him or with Him.

From the Via Dolorosa He was led into a narrow lane, a passage that connects the Street of Pain with the open space of Mount Calvary. In this dreadful lane, perhaps trampled upon by those who were pressing behind Him, Jesus fell the third time. It is the NINTH STATION.

Adoramus te, etc.

Mount Calvary in those days may have been within or without the wall of the city. It is useless to discuss the question where, opinions are bound to conflict to the end of time. It is now within this city wall. After the Ninth Station you enter a court which is flanked on three sides with the Church of the Holy Sepulchre.

In the vestibule of the church sit the Turkish guards, cross-legged on their divans, smoking cigarettes, and looking insolently upon the people who are constantly swarming in and out.

The immense building covers a multitude of shrines. In one corner of it is a large rock, the summit of the elevation known Mount Calvary; the main floor of the church is but fourteen and one-half feet below the top of the rock; on the rocks are chapels established by the Greeks and Latins. These chapels, perhaps ten paces in length and about as many in breadth, is Golgotha, the place of the skull. A ring of stone in the pavement of the chapel marks the spot where Jesus was stripped of His garments. It is the

TENTH STATION.

Adoramus te, etc.

Three paces distant He was nailed to the cross. At the

ELEVENTH STATION.

Adoramus te, etc.

A flight of steps leads to the great gate of the barrack; at the first of these steps, on the 6th of Good Friday, kneeling nearly hundreds of the devout or the indifferent, is the spot where He was made to bear His cross. It is the SECOND STATION.

Adoramus te, etc.

At this point, looking up the street which ascends slightly, on our right hand, is a shrine called the Chapel of the Scourging. Six or eight paces farther on, we come to the

THIRD STATION.

Adoramus te, etc.

A little farther on stands the house of the poor man Lazarus; and still farther up the street is the house of the rich Dives; between these houses, opposite a lane that diverges to the left, Jesus was met by His Blessed Mother. It is the

FOURTH STATION.

Adoramus te, etc.

A continual tide of traffic flows to and fro; no one, or, at most, but few, pause at this spot. No one knows, until he has passed over the Way of the Cross in the flesh, how hard it is to pay due reverence to the sanctity of these many shrines. A thousand things distract you; a thousand busy feet press down upon you, for of all the streets in Jerusalem this holiest of the holy is the chief avenue of trade. Let us pass on; it is but a step to the house of Dives, above referred to, and there Simon of Cyrene received the cross upon his shoulders; a stone set in the wall bears the impression of the hand of our Lord, which He stretched forth for support when He was high fainting under the weight of His Cross. It is the

FIFTH STATION.

Adoramus te, etc.

A hundred paces farther on, holy Veronica received in her handkerchief the impression of the divine Face, stained with the sweat of blood. It is the SIXTH STATION.

Adoramus te, etc.

Here the street grows narrower and more crooked; sometimes it passes under houses only two stories in height, as is common with streets in Jerusalem; sometimes it is arched over for a little space, as if to afford shelter in bad weather; then it runs to the right or left to escape the corners or the bulging fronts of houses on either side. Passing under one of these arches we reach the spot where Jesus fell the second time; at the

SEVENTH STATION.

A few paces farther, He was met by the daughters of Jerusalem, who mourned for Him. It is the Ecce Homo Arch, where Pilate uttered the words "Behold the man!" Farther up, on the right side of the street, is the convent of Irene Hasisiahem. The left side of the street as far as the eye can see is a bare wall; indeed the Via Dolorosa seems more like an alley in the rear of a town than one of the greatest, and certainly the most famous and interesting thoroughfares in the world.

Very soon the street descends into the now shallow and almost imperceptible Tyropoon Valley, and turns abruptly to the left under the wall of an ancient bath of the Sultan.

At this turn stands a broken column, such as one as might be passed a thousand times uncircled. Here, at last, fell the first time under the weight of His cross. It is the

THIRD STATION.

Adoramus te, etc.

A little farther on stands the house of the poor man Lazarus; and still farther up the street is the house of the rich Dives; between these houses, opposite a lane that diverges to the left, Jesus was met by His Blessed Mother. It is the

And yonder, under the great dome of the church, is the Sepulchre where He was laid —the

FOURTEENTH STATION.

Adoramus te, etc.

This is the pilgrimage which can be made daily in any chapel in the land. One needs only to have the spirit of a crusader to follow that Way of Pain with a heart ready to breaking, and with eyes dimmed with tears. Yet, who that hath a heart and is not ashamed of tears may not walk the holy way of the cross, crying, "Our feet shall stand within thy gates, O Jerusalem!"

The Church Flourishes with Liberty.

"The only Church in America," said Prof. Robert Flint in a recent lecture in Edinburgh, "which has preserved its unity unbroken is the Roman Catholic Church, and its progress has been extraordinary rapid. A hundred years ago the Roman Catholics in the States stood to their other inhabitants in the proportion of one to a hundred. Now they are as one to seven. It is natural that they should be confident that their Church has a glorious future before it in the New World." Many reasons have suggested that in the free atmosphere of the United States Roman Catholicism could scarcely live, and still less flourish; that before the breath of liberty it would wither away and die. If they had thought of Canadian Roman Catholicism, perhaps they would not have formed this opinion. They would, undoubtedly, not have done so if they had understood either the strength of Roman Catholicism or its adaptiveness to more liberty—that is, of liberty dissociated from truth and piety. The facts show that Roman Catholicism can flourish wonderfully in the United States. Liberty is unable or yet to boast of any remarkable triumphs over it. There is even no Old Catholicism in the States. It is the Romanism of the Vatican which rules there over nearly seven millions of attached, obedient, and hopeful disciples."

The Secret of the Success of the Catholic Missionaries.

Non-Catholics are constantly wondering how it is that Catholic missions are so successful. The reason can easily be explained They observe and fulfil the condition our Saviour long ago laid down, "Except a man away himself," etc. They practice self-denial and carry the cross. Take the missionaries of China as an instance. They adopt the customs of the Chinese, endure hardships that are scarcely conceivable of a Christian country, sleep upon the naked hard planks and eat the same food as the natives, and forgetful of the outside world, frequently shut off from all communication with it for months or years, forgetful of self, constantly practicing self-denial, they are wholly absorbed in winning souls to Christ.

Right Rev. Thomas L. Grace, Bishop of St. Paul, intends to open a seminary for the education of young men for the priesthood, in the beginning of next September.

REDPATH ON DAVITT'S ARREST.

It Will Solidify Ireland on the Land League Demand and the Entire Abolition of Landlordism.

A People's Movement, and Nothing Can Arrest It.

Mr. James Redpath, who has been lecturing in the principal cities of the West to overflowing houses, was in Chicago last week, and in the course of an interview with the Chicago Tribune as to the effect of Davitt's arrest and the suspension of the obstructionists he said:

"It will result in a solid Ireland. It will drive thousands of Protestant farmers to Ulster into the Land League. Of late the Land League has been making rapid progress in Ulster, because they find that they have no protection under the Ulster custom against a constant increase of rent, and they have come to see that their only security lies in the entire abolition of Landlordism. They have enjoyed for over two hundred years greater rights than Gladstone proposes to extend to the rest of Ireland, and yet they find these rights only intolerable to protect them against the exactions of the landlords.

"Davitt still as popular as ever!

"HE HAS A STRONGER HOLD ON THE HEARTS OF THE PEOPLE than any man in Ireland, without exception. His arrest will produce a belligerent animosity against the Gladstone Government, because everybody in Ireland knows that, unless he has committed the capital offence, he has never uttered a word urging violence. On the contrary, he has done more to restrain the people from violence than any man, than all the British troops and constabulary put together. He is a idol of the people; he is a saint in Ireland. Journalists should arrest every leader the movement would go on, because the younger generation in Ireland are as well educated as the people of Illinois. The country schools now are quite as good there as ours, and the people are all republicans. This is emphatically a people's movement, and it is not the result of agitation by the leaders. This is shown by the fact that the Land League made its most rapid strides while Davitt, Parnell and Dillon were not directing its movements,—while they were in America in fact.

"What is your view as to the obstructive tactics adopted by Parnell and his associates in Parliament which resulted in their suspension?

"There is one thing to be considered there. The speaker himself has often expressed the opinion that Parnell was one of the ablest parliamentarians in the House of Commons, but I think it certain that he has never been zealot. This is an English opinion of Parnell, you understand. His bodies are what is known among us as "filibustering." By this system of obstruction they succeeded in forcing the Tories to their wrongs, instead of submitting for centuries as they had done to be simply trampled on. It was

A MASTERLY SYSTEM OF ADVERTISING THE WRONGS OF IRELAND.

"Have you seen the statement made in the correspondence of the Times of Chicago, papers relative to the alleged increase of outrages in Ireland for last year?

"Yes, and I have carefully analyzed it. The best answer to it is the fact that the official returns of the British Government, published in November last, show that the proportion of the criminal classes in and out of prison, and transported, was at least five times to time cast a shadow over it, and it is only highly dangerous to Ireland to regard their perpetration as the most dangerous country, or one in which there are more of the signs of oppression and misery which have driven people to desperate deeds than any other.

This document was signed by Archbishop McCabe of Dublin, as Chairman, in the name of all the Archbishops and Bishops present at the meeting. Here, then, we find the very Archbishop, whose words of condemnation are quoted in the dispatches to the daily press, asking "God to bless this just struggle" which the Land League is making, in order to "repeal the cruel laws which have made Irish people so miserable to conclude, therefore, that the newspaper-ther of the press has manufactured the more recent opinions attributed to Archbishop McCabe, out of his own fertile imagination, as the Archbishop, in his letter, in the foregoing extract, plainly endorses the Land League movement, and implores the blessing of God upon its successful issue.

In a recent Pastoral the Rt. Rev. Bishop of Clogher thus alludes to the "lawful combination" of men who have awoke from their lethargy and are determined to right the wrongs under which their country so long has suffered. His Lordship says:

"Our country cannot be expected to the grace of the world a social upheaving which is directed to the right of the people to the right. Let being rescued by the charity of the world from the jaws of a cruel famine, by joining together in lawful combination, have proclaimed that they shall no longer submit to the conditions of life which keep the bulk of them in a state of chronic discontent and misery, to be turned into the barrows of a national famine through the failure of a single potato. It is not time that such a state of things should end, and that Irishmen, who are patriots of Ireland, thrift, industry and prosperity in every foreign land, should no longer be kept in a perpetual struggle between life and death on this island which God has given for their support?

"It is not the clergy to impress on their flocks the necessity of prudence, moderation and charity in the present agitation, and to be the keeping strictly within the laws of God and His Church and of the civil laws as well, we and on the priests and people to join with us at this supreme moment in making an earnest appeal to Almighty God that He may move the hearts of our rulers and legislators to send at length a message of relief to the long suffering nation."

The Rt. Rev. Bishop of Clonfert, referring to the Pope's letter to Archbishop McCabe, says:

"It is needless to assure his Holiness that the Irish people will receive and obey his paternal advice with that reverential love which is characteristic of their traditional fidelity to the Holy See. He knows well that the people will do nothing to be regretted, there is no danger of a departure on the part of the Irish people from the principles of equity and justice. In the meantime it is earnestly hoped that Parliament will save, by wise, vigorous and inclusive legislation put an end to a state of things which has given rise to agitation that will not cease to exercise the public mind until it is finally settled in conformity with the eternal laws of equity and justice.

Bishop Duggan also sent a letter to the promoters of a large Land meeting at Ballinasloe, which concluded with this candid advice and endorsement:

If the Irish people united, and unflinchingly sustained their representatives, the final settlement of this burning question would not be delayed. If rumor speaks the truth, the land measures proposed by the Cabinet would fall short of a final settlement. They should avoid every word or act of intimidation. The spectacle lord by the Saxon authorities has been pronounced to be tragic.

Most Rev. Dr. Nulty, Bishop of Meath, recently returned from Rome, and delivered a speech before a vast assemblage of his people who had convened to welcome him home. In the course of his remarks he said, in alluding to the sentiments of the Pope on the Land League organization:

He replied to me also to state that his Holiness did not disapprove the just, lawful, and peaceable agitation for the recalling of their ancient rights (loud applause). On the contrary, his Holiness had expressed the strongest possible desire, and had almost given expression to a prayer that they would be successful in the recovery of their rights.

Alluding to the designs of the Coercion Bill, this eminent prelate says:

THE MONITOR.

TWENTY-FOURTH YEAR OF PUBLICATION.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

THURSDAY.....MARCH 24.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

Mr. S. J. McCormick will start on a canvassing and collecting tour in the interest of the MONITOR about the 20th inst., and will visit Redwood, Santa Clara, San Jose, Gilroy, Hollister, Watsonville, Santa Cruz, Monterey, and intermediate points. We hope the Rev. Clergy and our friends in any sect' s be may visit will help him in promoting the interests of this organ of their faith. During his absence Mr. McCormick will send in correspondence from the several points where Catholic affairs are of sufficient importance. We ask our subscribers in advance to may visit to be prepared to renew their subscriptions and to help add an additional name to our increasing list of MONITOR readers.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

—Mr. S. J. McCormick, Managing Editor of this paper, left on yesterday for the purpose of visiting the southern counties of the State in the interests of the MONITOR, and we ask for him the kind attention and courtesy of our friends to assist him in placing the MONITOR in the homes of every Catholic family throughout California.

—There are by actual count 110 churches, chapels or missions in San Francisco, of which 7 are Hebrew, 26 Roman Catholic and 77 Protestant. The Protestant churches have a membership of some 48,000; the Catholic, about 35,000; the Hebrew, 5,000. The seating capacity of these churches is about 45,000, but they are seldom over two thirds full, so that 27,000 church goers is all that that city of 234,000 inhabitants contains.—Sacramento Bee.

We do not know how far correct the Bee is regarding its Protestant and Jewish statistics, but in the case of the Catholic it is sadly astray. We think it would be a safe estimate to place the Catholics of this city at from 90,000 to 100,000. In making estimates of church goers Protestant authorities base their calculations upon the seating capacity of churches, entirely ignoring the fact that although a Catholic Church may hold only one thousand people, yet six thousand Catholics may hear Mass in it every Sunday, if air priests are necessary in the parish.

—Mr. John W. Siohan, a former resident of California and now residing at Rome, sends us an official copy of the Syllabus and Encyclical. Our readers may now be assured that when we publish documents in Italics, we do shall speak or utterhis.—P. F.

It by no means follows that because an enemy of the Church possesses official records he will thereby tell the truth with the tone of authority. Gladstone, Froude and other anti-Catholic writers have been sought grubbing Vatican documents before now, and from what we have already seen of Frank Pixley's perversions of truth, we have reason to believe that he will continue to "Hie like a misplaced milestone" in all matters concerning the Catholic Church.

—The supposed birthday of the mythical saint and patron of Ireland, who was born in France and died in Scotland, was celebrated in this city in the usual way.—P. P.

Wrong again, Frank. It is not the birthday of St. Patrick that is celebrated, nor is the saint's existence mythical in any way, nor was he born in France. A little study of Irish history would save many scribblers from making themselves ridiculous when they write through motives of malice stooped in ignorance.

—We had not room in last week's issue to call the attention of our readers to the beautiful poem contained in the prose written for the St. Patrick's Day celebration in this city, by Miss Grace A. Welsh, a gifted graduate of Notre Dame Academy, San Jose, and the niece of John and Philip A. Roach of this city. Book of our readers who may not have perused this poem will have lost a real pleasure, unless they belong to that prosy class who think poetry is only fit for sentimental young men and love-sick young ladies. Like Miss Skidmore, Miss Welsh will yet attain a high position among the poets of America.

—The best poem yet dedicated to Michael Davitt appears on our first page to-day. It breathes in every line the spirit of patriotic inspiration, and the MONITOR thanks Miss Kate E. Quinlan for her contribution, whilst every lover of liberty will join with her in the prayer:

"Oh! patriot brave! oh hero true!
God speed the moment when
The fetters broken, thou'lt stand again
Free man amid free men!"

Banquet to Land League Meeting.

One of the speakers at a so-called Land League meeting last night is reported to have said that "one pound of dynamite is better than a thousand speeches." Now, this kind of talk does far more harm than good. It is in direct violation of the principles, aims and objects of the Land League organization, and only affords a pretext for the English Government to palliate their cruelty policy towards the Irish people. Besides it is the veriest bosh, and it is our experience that gentlemen who indulge in this kind of talk have never dealt, and never intend to deal, either dynamite or gunpowder. Not one of this class would dare speak in this style if in Ireland, but here, they are safely ensconced miles away from the reach of the British lion's claws, it is the very courage of Falstaffian bravado. Illegal means in opposition and "blowing up Windsor Castle," etc. We hope the presiding officers at Land League meetings will squelch such demagogic nonsense. If not, no respectable man will attend them, and they will quickly degenerate into pot-house rings for political and communistic mountebanks. So far, with one or two exceptions, these meetings have been conducted in a manner befitting the noble and patriotic cause they are intended to promote. There have raised considerable sneer for the "man in the pap." It would, indeed, be deplorable if designing men should succeed either in lowering the character or inducing any evil or disruptive element into the proceedings of the Land League.

The Lenten Pastorals at Last.

For the past two weeks the wires have been utilised by the agents of England in assuring the people in every portion of the world that the Bishops of Ireland, in their Lenten Pastorals, condemned the Land League, condemned Parnell for his league with French Communists, and appealed to the Irish people to withdraw their allegiance from an organization that was condemned by the Church. We have also been informed us that, as a natural consequence, the Land League organization was rapidly falling to pieces, that the priests and the people were alike demoralized, that the funds were falling off, and generally speaking a general assertion that the chief actors in the exploded organization were fleeing to the four quarters of the globe, in order to escape from British vengeance on one side, and the curse of the Church on the other.

The last mail from Ireland brought to us the very Pastorals upon which the press predicted so many disasters as likely to befall the Land League, and, in order that the readers of the MONITOR may see how much mistaken not to use a harsher term —the English news-maker was in his efforts to poison the reading public into antagonism with the Land League, we append copious extracts from the Pastorals of some of the most eminent Prelates in Ireland:

First in importance is the Lenten Pastoral of Dr. McEvilly, Coadjutor-Archbishop of Tuam, who thus alludes to the "crying wrongs of our misgoverned country:"

"Would we not be wanting in the well-regulated charity we owe ourselves were we to omit, at this important crisis in our country's history, earnestly praying to Him who holds in His hands the hearts of men, that He would inspire our rulers to redress with that spirit of fairness and justness, free of true patriotism, which is sure in the end to triumph over all obstacles, the crying wrongs of our misgoverned country, and by a course of just legislation lay up the sources of the discontent and dissatisfaction which must universally prevail so long as the present state of things continues? While the great bulk of our people are allowed to live in the land of their birth, in most cases on mere sufferance; while they are kept in constant dread, so far as the action of law is concerned, of being the victims, in many instances, of plunder and spoliation; while in a state of anxious uncertainty, they have cause to dread, in many cases, being turned adrift at the whim of irresponsible power, and of forfeiting the fruits of long toil and outlay, which is in reality for thousands a question of life or death—and they, in many cases, are kept as regarded as free? Wants they see before their eyes the labour defrauded of his hire on a gigantic scale—what else can we term compelling men to pay in ever increasing rents for the fruits of their hard industry!—can they be contented or happy?"

Even prejudiced Pixley himself would scarcely be able to torture this language into any condemnation of the Land League! It is rather a condemnation of England, and a re-affirmation of the principles of the Land League stamped with the seal of ecclesiastical authority. John Bull, therefore, has nothing to boast of in this Pastoral.

The Most Rev. Dr. Derry, Roman Catholic Bishop of Clogher, so far from occuring the Land League, actually has the courage to brand the legislation of England against Ireland as "organized oppression, confiscation and expatriation." Here is a paragraph from the Pastoral which must have given Gladstone the jaundice:

"We have hitherto calling on the Legislature to rescue us from land laws which condemn our people to starvation and destruction; and now, for the hundredth time, our appeal is unheeded by Coercion Acts and Arms Acts. And this is to go on forever! Are we to be left still suffering patience to a starving multitude, loyalty and submission to a people for whom we have but organized oppression, confiscation, expatriation? We have hope that this may not be so, and that occasions of humanity and prudence may at length induce Ministers to listen to the hands of God. Whilst we ask the clergy to impress on their flocks the necessity of prudence, moderation, and charity in the present agitation, and the need of keeping strictly within the laws of God and His Church and the civil law as well, we call on our rulers and people to join with us, at this supreme moment, in fervently an earnest appeal to Almighty God, that He may move the hearts of our rulers and legislators to send at length a measure of relief to a long-suffering nation. For this purpose, we ordain that the clergy and faithful of this diocese do enter on a Novena, or nine days of devotional exercises, beginning with the 9th and ending with the 17th day of March, the feast of our Patron Apostle.

"If political organization, hitherto legal and peaceful, seems to be prevented by coercive measures, the clergy must seek a peaceable way, lest, over popular enthusiasm may turn their influence against them, and that secret combination and dark conspiracy take the place of open agitation."

It will be seen by the closing paragraph that Bishop Donnelly's only dread is that the present legal agitation will be stopped by coercion and the people of Ireland driven into secret conspiracy against oppression. Here, too, we find not only no censure of the Land League, but, moreover, a tacit acknowledgment of its usefulness and necessity in order to gain for the suffering Irish people their long looked-for rights.

The Pastoral of the Most Rev. Dr. P. J. MacCormack, Lord Bishop of Achonry, contains a clarion blast against John Bull. His Lordship glories in the united Ireland which the Land League has created, and he calls upon priests and people not to abate a single title of the agitation until the principles of the Land League prevail in Ireland. Here is the language of a worthy patriotic Prelate:

"The earnest appeal for redress has at length gone forth, a combined effort to make the injustice is now as in a every province in Ireland—in the black North as well as in the sunny South. We may rest assured that an urgent appeal to God for justice cannot and will not be disregarded, which is emanate from Protestant as well as Catholic—from a body of united Irish-men, determined to do all in their power that justice is on their side. But with that thorough perseverance should be united an earnest endeavor to discountenance the employment of violence, illegal means in support of this all-important social reform. Let coercion do its worst; it can never prevail in quenching the claims of justice or silencing the spirit of our united people in their demand."

"We exhort both clergy and people to hold together, united in sentiment and action in this great crisis of our country. The clergy of Ireland owe a deep debt of loyalty to their faithful flocks, and as long as the people pursue the paths of justice and equity the clergy shall ever be found by their side. If the British Government will only make an honest effort to redress the glaring grievances under wh... our poor people have suffered for ages in unparalleled misery, then they can spare a noble loyalty, and the cordial good-will of every true Christian. But unless in and out of Parliament of the people and of the people's representatives takes the lead of redress, even in the full noonday of admitted wrongs, Irish coercion as we have witnessed of before, exasperating in the highest degree, in every shape and form that ingenuity could devise. Perhaps, it may be suggested, this course has a silver lining upon it; perhaps it is the precursor of real radical reform. Yes, the moral, perhaps, without any guarantee. If we real English promises and English pledges to Ireland by the light of the past, we can place but little faith in the assurance of British Ministers, in any event, coercion or redress, we counsel no harassed people to patience, and will upon them to avoid every snare, and baffle every effort, to lead them into violation of the laws; but we, at the same time, would earnestly encourage them not to abate their legitimate aspiration for land reform, nor lower the flag of constitutional agitation, until perseverance shall have crowned their just cause with victory."

Grand words, these, and words too, that will cheer the hearts of many MONITOR readers and lead them to renewed efforts "not to lower the flag of constitutional agitation, until perseverance shall have crowned their just cause with success."

The Most Rev. Dr. Duggan, Lord Bishop of Clonfert, portrays the poverty-stricken condition of his people in strong colors, and hopes that the present agitation may end the wrongs under which Ireland having labored. Here is the language on these points:

"It is earnestly hoped that Parliament will soon, by wise, vigorous, and incisive legislation, put an end forever to this burning land agitation—an agitation that will not cease to exercise a public mind in some form or another until finally settled on principles in conformity with the sacred laws of equity and justice. The condition of the laboring poor and artisans cannot be little, as in other towns, in this year simply deplorable. The time is to be said of numbers of the small farmers of land throughout this diocese. The failure of the potato crop affects those classes in a terrible manner. For large numbers of them we see no alternative but starvation, or a jubilee—unless in outdoor relief combined with employment in works of public utility. The rigid application of the workhouse test to able-bodied females, families, involving the eternal disruption of home ties, in seasons of exceptional severity, would be simply inhuman. As the duties entrusted by the Legislature to those charged with the administration of the Poor laws are being more and more extended from year after year, it should be borne in mind both by the ratepaying electors and guardians, that their responsibilities are becoming constantly increased—hence, staying other matters, the duty on both to exercise the strictest economy with a jubilous and humane regard to the condition of the indigent. It would be impossible to find words to adequately express our thanks to the munificent benefactors from all parts of the world who came to the relief of the famine-stricken people of our locality during last year. We take this opportunity of again expressing our heartfelt acknowledgments. Let us hope the time is not far distant when there will be an end of such mendicancy."

To put an end forever to the mendicancy of Ireland, is one of the principles of the Land League. It has declared that the poor-box shall not be again passed around the world to help to feed a people who are pauperized by the penal laws of England. If England makes paupers she must feed them, but the Land League is determined that neither persecution nor pauperism shall exist in Ireland, and God speed them in removing these twin relics of English barbarity forever from the Green Isle.

The Right Rev. Dr. Durrian, Bishop of Down, so far from censuring the Land League, actually counsels his flock "to continue to discuss their grievances" until they obtained redress. Here is his Lordship's language on this point:

"As far as he understood the proceedings, he could see nothing in the principles of the agitation, an equitable settlement of the land question on the principle of compensation for disturbance, the coercive legislation of the Government as unreasonable, irritating and illegical. Coercion was the weapon of the tyrant, not a remedy for disappointed hopes. It was a weapon which they not love; and terror would not lead to willing obedience of the law. In conclusion, he counselled his flock to continue to discuss their grievances and keep within the law until redress was constitutionally obtained."

Here is a plain and palpable endorsement of the Land League which sounds like the death-knell of Landlordism in Ireland for ever.

The Mos. Rev. Dr. Warren, Bishop of Ferns, like a true pastor of souls, caution his people to continue their agitation beneath the shadow of the Cross so that religion might guide and bless the real of patriots. Here is his language on this point:

"The people were also cautioned against taking any course that is not sanctioned by God's holy religion. Though the Force did not disapprove of the people seeking redress of their grievances by constitutional means, he said that in the present agitation as it was carried on there were certain things he could not approve of. The Bishop reminded them that the slightest wilful violation of the laws of truth, justice, equity or any other moral virtue could never be permitted by the Catholic Church, either for escaping temporal evils, or for obtaining the greatest temporal advantage. In conclusion, he exhorted the people to have patience, and by resistance to the holy will of God to make sure they have H n on their side. If God was against them, what temporal advantage could they ever attain in temporal concerns."

We think these extracts are sufficient to satisfy any reasonable reader that so far from the Bishops of Ireland condemning the Land League, the only dread felt by the Prelates is the fear that coercion will create secrecy among the people, and thus they will be changed from open and legal agitators into secret conspirators. The Bishops condemn crime upon the just principle that wrongs must not be remedied by the perpetration of criminal acts, but rather by the moral forces of public opinion, backed by a spirit of equal and exact justice on the part of those who hold the reins of government. But, as Dr. Dorrian well says: "Coercion is the weapon of the tyrant, not the remedy for hungry multitudes", and, unless England can be made to change her policy in this respect, the day is not far distant when the peace policy of Irish politics will be flung to the winds and the long-tortured slaves of English tyranny will be driven to seek, in other fields, the remedy for their country's wrongs. This is no apparent to the Prelates of Ireland that they appeal to their people to persevere in peaceful agitation and to pray to God that the hearts of their task masters may be touched by Divine mercy, so as to avert from Ireland the sanguinary scenes of civil war. The warning voice of the Bishops should be heard in the Halls of Westminster, as they see the smouldering volcano of Irish wrath growing greater every day, and, like the prophets of old, they tell their people to turn to God in their troubles and He will give them that freedom for which they have so long prayed and to which they are entitled by their fidelity to the faith that springs from the principles of eternal justice to all men—whether rich or poor, bond or free.

England Baffled by the Irish Bishops.

All honor to the Irish prelates who opposed the appointment of a Papal Nuncio at the English Court! There names deserve to be inscribed in letters of gold upon the archives of Ireland's best and purest family their action they have not only proved their fidelity to the cause of the Irish people, but they have also checkmated England in the effort to bribe the patriotism of the Irish people through a plenipotentiary of the Pope resident in England. The scheme devised by the English ministers was in effect to induce the Pope to nominate a Nuncio who was to reside in London, and through whom all official correspondence between the English Government and the Pope would have to be conducted. By this means England hoped to reach the ear of the Pope and prejudice his mind against the Irish people, by removing matters pertaining to Ireland beyond the control of the Irish Bishops—under whose immediate supervision they are at present, but whose present official relations would be rendered entirely nugatory by the appointment of a Nuncio resident in London. But the brave Irish Bishops were too wary for John Bull. They saw the dangerous trap into which England sought to lure them, and, knowing they at once put the seal of their condemnation upon the unholy project. God bless them for this good deed! Had England succeeded in this nefarious scheme it would have removed from the path of persecution, which Gladstone proposes for Ireland, one of its greatest impediments, as England feels that it cannot rule Ireland with a rod of iron as long as the prelates and priests of Ireland stand between the oppressor and the oppressed. Gladstone feels that victory will eventually rest with the Vatican, and he sought to circumvent the power of the Irish prelacy, by having a seminary of England represent the Irish Bishops in the British Court. Then, indeed, English diplomacy would so mould ecclesiastical opinion, both in Rome and England, that Ireland would be driven into renewed slavery and starvation, apparently under the seal of ecclesiastical authority.

Thus has English diplomacy been a second time foiled by the virtue and vigilance of the Irish Bishops. The brave Bishop Croke of Cashel and his compatriots, who visited Rome last Fall, placed in the possession of the Holy Father sufficient testimony to prove to his Holiness that the cause of the Irish people was fully in accord with the principles of religion and justice. They secured the good will and the influence of the Pope on the side of the Irish people, and English statesmen found their map of campaign, which they trained the Vatican to ask the Sovereign Pontiff to withhold his opinion upon Irish affairs until England had presented her side of the story.

We need not wonder, therefore, when we read in the dispatches that Gladstone's health is failing through the worry and excitement consequent upon the Irish agitation. Foiled in Parliament by the obstruction of the Irish members, defeated in Ireland by the passive resistance of the people, circumvented in the Court of Rome by the Irish Bishops, Gladstone sees all his plans and projects, which he had so rusty tools—refurbished for Ireland's crucifixion—fall hermetically at the feet of the very people they were intended to punish. Heaven speed the hour when the Gladstone Government will be compelled from power, its leader relegated to the rank of a powerless politician, and Ireland's cause placed in the hands of a just and liberal Parliament.

Affairs in Ireland.

The following telegram will give our readers an idea of the agitated state of Ireland at present, and also carry to them the gratifying intelligence that the efforts of the Irish people in America sustains the struggling priests and people in their efforts to ameliorate the condition of affairs in that impoverished country:

CHICAGO, March —. A representative of the Chicago Times at Dublin telegraphs that an immense number of ejectment processes have been served in Galway and many other counties. Large bodies of the police are out every day in Galway protecting servers. Many of the process servers have refused to act. A landlord was obliged to serve a hundred ejectments himself, protected by a large force of police. There is a vast amount of misery among the people everywhere, but they are determined to hold out to the last. The great spread of the movement in America has raised the spirit of the people to an extent never witnessed before. Even large farmers are permitting their cattle to be seized and sold by the Sheriff rather than break the rules of the League. Crowds attend the sales, but no one bids against the agents of the Emergency Committee. The auctioneers, refusing to act, the bailiffs have to manage the sales. People regard the promised Land bill as a farce, and have no hope except in the League. The priests are more active than ever since the passage of the Coercion Act, and are urging the people to endure anything rather than rackrents. More arrests are expected, and it is rumored that Dublin City will be proclaimed next week. If the threatened evictions are carried out a great disturbance will follow.

The Irish Land Measure.

The Central News—a leading English paper—claims to be able to state that the following will form the basis of the Government Land Bill for Ireland. It says that "the surplus fund of the Irish Church will be devoted first, to the reclamation of waste lands in Ireland; secondly, to assist the migration of the people from overcrowded to less crowded districts; and third, a carefully drawn scheme to assist emigration will be furthered. In addition thereto, the Government measure will include the three F's guarded by certain restrictive provisions that it is thought will be found necessary for the practical working of the measure."

The Pope and Parliament.

The peace of the British Parliament has recently been actually disturbed by the Pastoral letter of an Irish Bishop. Hitherto nothing short of a Papal Bull could intimidate the average British statesman, but so sensitive has that tribe become by reason of recent events, that even the Pastoral Letter of a Bishop, issued at the opening of the ministerial season, has nearly thrown Parliament into hysterics! The Bombastes Furioso who brought the immortal Pastoral to the attention of her Majesty's ministers was Lord Stanley of Alderley, who desired to call the attention of the Lords to the concluding paragraph in the Pastoral Letter of Dr. Gillooly, Bishop of Elphin, and which he read as follows

While we express this confidence in the religious and peaceful disposition of our people, we feel it a duty to declare that, should the Government and Legislature fail to satisfy in the present session of Parliament the just demands of the cultivators of the soil, they shall stand out before the Irish nation as responsible influences, which the hope of remedial legislation has unknown, and upon occasion of this charge to exercise in their favor.

Lord Stanley of Alderley thought he saw treason-felony in this do...ument. Perhaps he had no love for Catholic Bishops in general, and Irish Bishops in particular, so he desired the Secretary for Foreign Affairs to bring this treasonable language of Dr. Gillooly under notice of the Pope, so that the rebellious Dr. Gillooly might be reprimanded or removed for having dared to threaten her most excellent Majesty's Ministers with the withdrawal of his influence in restraining the Irish people from breaking out into open rebellion in case Parliament does not remedy the evils under which they so long have suffered.

The Earl of Derby replied that although he had not the honor of knowing the Right Rev. of Elphin, nevertheless, he had received a letter from his Lordship in which he had stated that he was thoroughly in union with the Irish people in all their efforts for obtaining legal redress for their wrongs, and that "the restraining influence of the clergy" did not refer to any acts save those under constitutional agitation, which the refusal of remedial measures may still necessitate. Earl Granville closed his speech by informing the scared Lord Stanley that he had no intention of bringing the Pastoral of Dr. Gillooly under the notice of the Pope, and thus this no-Popery "tempest in a tea-pot was squelched, and Lord Stanley very severely snubbed for his efforts to broil an Irish prelate in an international difficulty.

"Trials of the Church."

We have read enough of Rev. W. Gleeson's "Tatal's and Martyrs of Ireland; or Persecutors of Religion," to justify us in according it a place among the more important works issued thus far from the American Catholic press. Father Gleeson has succeeded in condensing into two volumes a succinct account of all the persecutions through which the Church has passed from the days of Julian the Apostate down to the present day, and doing so he at times has not left an important historical event which could throw light upon the subject, that he has not collated for his readers. Volumes of the work are calculated to stir the dormant blood of Catholics in these degenerate days, when they read how nobly the martyrs suffered and how grandly they died for that very same faith which now, alas! so many Catholics seem to value so lightly. The chapters devoted to the persecution of the Church in England and in Ireland will also be read with great pleasure and profit, as they enter into more detail of the cruelty against our faith than any book yet issued in America, and the valuable historical documents in the appendix add greatly to the literary value of the work for both Catholic and non-Catholic readers.

As we stated last week, the profits of the work is devoted towards paying the indebtedness on the schools which Father Gleeson has erected, and we hope his valuable contribution to the Catholic literature of this country may be the medium, not only of fame to the talented author, but also be the means of enabling him to carry on these institutions of learning, without which it is vain to hope for much good among the coming generation of Catholics.

In a future issue we will give a few examples of the bigotry of persecuting the Church from Father Gleeson's very interesting pages.

Recent Heartless Evictions in Ireland.

The St. James' Gazette, a London paper, gives the following brief but suggestive details of evictions which are almost daily occurring in Ireland. We have italicized a portion of the extract, leaving to our readers the task of commenting on and condemning the brutality and un-Christian tendency of the laws of England, which creates, protects and enforces such scandalous laws for the oppression of a civilized people:

"Several evictions," says the St. James' Gazette, "took place on February 18 on the estate of Mr. M. Geough, J. P., near Newtown, Hamilton, county Armagh. The decrees were enforced under the protection of fifty policemen. Many painful scenes were witnessed. Children and aged persons—some on the latter being in very delicate health—were turned out upon the roadside." "The Freeman's Journal of Wednesday announced that Lord Annaly had determined to evict the whole of his tenants in the county Longford who do not pay their rents at the rate at which they agreed to give, or to that effect to his agent. The result of this will be, it says, that nearly a third of the county Longford will be depopulated." It is stated that the tenantry have many grievances, and a hope is expressed that more may not lose her for friendly medium. On Wednesday the sub-sheriff of King's county, with sixty police and one hundred soldiers, evicted from his home a single priest, viz., the Rev. Mr. Harley, P. P. of Kilfidonan, near Parsonstown.

MICHAEL DAVITT TESTIMONIAL FUND.

Appeal of the Board of Trustees.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., March 24, 1881.

To the Patriotic Men and Women of Irish Blood, and to All who Hate Tyranny and Sympathize with the Oppressed Throughout the World:

The true and tried patriot, Michael Davitt, has again been immured in a felon's cell by the British Government. Without warning, without provocation, without any pleas of justice or form of trial, he has been torn from his home and fireside, and deprived of his liberty.

The inhuman treatment, to which he had been previously subjected during a period of nearly eight years in English convict prisons, had broken down and undermined his health, leaving him but a wreck in body to battle against the world. But England, or, no power on earth, could subdue his patriotic spirit. Released from his shackles, his life, since his incarceration, has been one of unceasing devotion to his country's cause, and the good work he has accomplished appeals in thunder-tones to the gratitude of his countrymen and of all sympathizers with suffering humanity. He is the founder of the "Irish National Land League." His active brain, it was, that planned, his hand that guided, and his tongue and pen that scattered the seed broadcast of this grand movement, so prolific of past, so pregnant of future good to the tillers of the soil in every land. When his countrymen were in danger of relaping into despair, and despair, alas! many were in the land, it was Michael Davitt was everywhere heard pleading in their behalf, and to-day his name is enshrined in their grateful hearts along "with the immortal few that were not born to die."

Always ready to sacrifice everything, even his life, if necessary, on the altar of his country, neither the remonstrances of friends, nor the inducements of possible good to be accomplished abroad, could restrain this hero from rushing to the front on Ireland's battle-ground when the signal of danger was heard.

We feel that we are responsible for the operation of the Land League than I am," said he, "and it shall never be said, I shirked my duty in the hour of danger." The result apprehended, soon followed. Michael Davitt's ticket-of-leave was revoked, and he was again thrown into prison. Still, from behind his prison-bars the voice of Michael Davitt goes forth, and is heard wherever beats a true Irish or patriotic heart, inciting us on to do and dare all that his counsel and noble example point out to us as the line of duty.

Patriots and martyrs, like Davitt, seek not the world's applause or the vanishing fame of a moment. Their aims are purely holier, loftier. But that does not lessen the obligation we are under of manifesting our gratitude to this benefactor of our race.

Such gratitude has to be more freely, the more generously discharged, when we know its recipient is restrained from the knowledge of our actions.

We, therefore, can we give a practical manifestation of our appreciation, and good-will towards Michael Davitt? To this we respectfully submit the proposition to raise a fund of fifty thousand dollars, to be known as the "Michael Davitt Testimonial Fund," and that we hereby unite to live in comfort for the remainder of his days, should he be so fortunate as to survive his long and living tomb. In order to make it, in the true sense of the word, a People's tribute, we have fixed the standard subscription at twenty-five cents—though not attempting to limit the generosity of subscribers.

The raising of this testimonial will be a telling rebuke to the present perfidious Gladstone Ministry, a fitting reply to the foul slanders heaped upon us in the British Parliament, and a convincing proof of our unbeatedness in the struggle we have gone on in Ireland of right against might. Least of all, it will prove to the world that we know how to appreciate the gallant services of the men in the gap.

The movement was initiated in this State on the 24th day of February last, on the 10th day of March, we, the undersigned, met in mass meeting of our fellow-citizens in this city, were unanimous in the resolve to carry out the objects herein set forth.

We earnestly invite your cordial co-operation in the good work.

True Text of Dillon's Speech.

In order again to convince our readers of how little dependence can be placed upon the telegrams received from England relative to Irish affairs, we append the following incidents:

Mr. John Dillon said to the Chicago Times Dublin correspondent that the speech had been grossly misrepresented. The home secretary had tried to fasten upon me the charge of being an advocate of assassination. When making an explanation to reply to the charge, I said if I were an Irish farmer, and a body of men came to evict me and my family from my house, I should resist by force and abide the consequences. I was dealing with the question how far it would be justifiable for a man to use force in the present condition of Ireland, but the statement was grossly perverted, explanation, and had nothing to do with the policy of the Land League. I pointed out on the contrary that the League had given a much advice. I always advised the people to abstain from violence in any shape. My language and meaning have been grossly perverted. Mr. Harcourt and the English press are so accustomed to misrepresentation of the kind that they have come to take it as a matter of course." It is the general opinion that the speech was reported for the purpose of getting sufficient feeling to warrant Dillon's arrest.

THE MONITOR.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

THURSDAY.....MARCH 24.

A GOOD LECTURE FOR A GREAT CHARITY.

Rev. Father Rooney, the eloquent and patriotic Dominican, will lecture in St. Patrick's on next Sunday evening for the benefit of the Children's Day Home, Powell street, under charge of the Sisters of the Holy Family, and a large and fashionable audience will be present to hear lover of eloquence and every person who desires to aid one of the best charities in the city. The Sisters are sadly in need of assistance to furnish their new Home for Children, and we hope this lecture will be a grand success financially. The subject chosen by Father Rooney is, "The Priesthood and the Confessional." Before the Lecture the following choice selections from the celebrated "Stabat Mater," by Rossini will be rendered: "Quis est Homo," duet, Mrs. Vignier and Miss B. Alnas; "Cujus Animam," tenor solo, Mr. Joseph Harrington; "Infamatus," soprano solo and grand chorus, Mrs. A. Eisen and chorus. The sacred music will commence precisely at 7½ p. m.

THE NEW CATHOLIC ORGANIZATION

The Catholic Mutual Beneficial Association is going about very rapidly. Every two weeks lately the Directors have to meet to pass on large number of applications. A large number of members have been elected at the two last meetings of the Board, within two weeks. Father Scanlan's sermon on the Catholic Mutual Beneficial Association, last Sunday evening, was listened to by a crowded audience, and that discourse was nearly five hundred people crowded into the vestibule of the Church, and could not get within hearing distance of the pulpit. The hall itself was elaborately decorated with flags and bunting, and that fact was typical of the day which called forth the celebration. The outer entrance was a large Irish harp formed of flowers in green, on a ground of harp, harp-strings, inscribed with the armorial insignia of the Land League and Land Leaguers. The walls were draped with Irish and American flags, together with portraits of Washington, O'Connell, Davitt and other patriots of the past and present. The programme of exercises comprised the following:

Part I.—Music, "Princess March," Dulleg Band; introductory address by Chairman of the day, Jas. R. Murphy; extract, "Wolfe Tone," Rev. T. J. Garrity; vocal solo, "When Erin Her Banner Unfurls," Miss Lynne; essay, "Chivalry," William H. Lonergan; instrumental quartet, "Queen of the Valley Overture," Essrs. Edmund Dulleg, Jr., Kennedy; music, "Shamboreen March," Dulleg Band; essay, "The Penal Code," Edward Myrick; vocal solo, "Killarney," A. J. Lynne; essay, "Irish Industries," J. J. Tuffy; J. Lonagan; "Musical Bank," College Band. Part II.—Essay, "Daniel O'Connell," E. Ryan; vocal solo, "My Precious Old Mother in Ireland," Miss Kavanagh; essay, "Ireland," William H. Lawrence; instrumental quartet, "Lucia," Essrs. Dulleg, Jr., Kennedy, Lamon, J. Tompkinson; original poem by Poet of the Day, James F. Boyd; vocal quartet, "Come When the Roses Are Blooming," J. J. Tuffy, W. B. Christy, T. Hum, J. Chapin; essay, "Intellectual Development," J. A. Donovan; "Son and I Hulan," College Orchestra; extract, "Emmet's Speech," Rev. Father Scanlan; "Kathleen Mavourneen," F. Gomez; oration by Poet of the Day, Thomas Davitt; music, "Signal Service March," College Band.

The Committee of Arrangements are convey to our readers an idea of the manner in which the entertainment which they had prepared for them was congratulate Prof. Schorle and the pupils of his dancing class on the skill displayed by them in their rendition of the musical selections of the programme. The young gentlemen whose recitations added additional interest to the occasion, and who displayed such marked ability and talent in their elocutionary efforts, and all the people of Holy St. Mary's may well feel proud of its pupils. The vocal selections were also good and deservedly applauded. The original poem by Mr. Boyd was from the heart, for deeply appreciations on such occasions, and yoice that was in unison with the sentiments of the poet, and the entertainment was a success.

At the conclusion of the above programme, Mr. J. Mc'Cormick of the Monitor introduced, and delivered a brief address, eulogizing the Land League and expressing, as he thousand dollars, to be known as the "Michael Davitt Testimonial Fund." Mr. Mc'Cormick said he was proud of the manner in which the Irish people had taken part in the programme, and that old Ireland must, indeed, be a good place, and have many gifted sons. At the conclusion of Mr. McCormick's remarks the entertainment ended.

MONITOR MENTION.

—In next week's issue will appear our third letter from the "Nom de Kennure." As usual, it will be bold, spicy, and full of interest to our readers.

—Next Sunday, Col. J. J. Tobin will address the Land League in Tennessee. We promise our friends there a rich intellectual treat, and we hope they will turn out to hear genuine Irish eloquence.

—A photographic dispatch from Merced, which appeared in the MONITOR last week, stated that the celebration of St. Patrick's Day ended with a mass meeting of our fellow-citizens in that city, we have to hope for more. We promise to carry out the objects herein set forth.

—From the Salinas Index we learn that "The arrangements for the purchase of the Flannery College in Hollister, by the Sisters of Charity, have not yet been completed, but we are informed that they are well under way. There is little doubt that the Sisters will take over a good school established there by the Smarts."

Land League Funds from Smartsville.

SMARTSVILLE, Yuba Co., Cal., March 15, 1881.

THADDEUS FLANAGAN, Esq.

Dear Sir—I received your favor of the 10th inst., and would have replied in a week sooner but waited for my second remittance.

I now remit you, per Wells, Fargo & Co., $31 40; first remittance, $176—total, $207 40. Please acknowledge receipt in press.

I pray God that something good may come of this movement; but prudence, prayer, and patriotic zeal must guide and inspire and direct the movement.

I remain sincerely yours,

M. COLMAN.

St. Patrick's Day Finances.

The Finance Committee of the St. Patrick's Day Convention assembled last Monday evening in one of the ante-rooms of the Irish-American Hall building, where they audited all bills that have to be paid growing out of the celebration, and the receipts will be in the neighborhood of $800, the disbursements $450, having a surplus of some $350 to be sent to Ireland.

Land League at Saxon.

A branch of the Irish Land League was organized on Sunday last by Hugh J. Mohan, of San Francisco. President, James Trainer; Secretary, P. J. McKeague; Treasurer, Daniel Corcoran. Mohan delivered an address of an hour's length, and created enthusiasm among the audience. His pointed remarks brought deep feelings to the hearts of all listeners, and the intelligent explanations of the principles of the Land League were favorably impressed on all present. Over one hundred signed the roll, and $78 50 was paid in.

FINANCIAL REPORT OF BRANCH NO. 1, LAND LEAGUE.

At the recent meeting of the above Branch, on last Monday night, the Treasurer and Auditor, the Secretary made a full and satisfactory report of the money received and expended under the auspices of the Branch, since its organization. From Mr. Flanagan's report it appears that the total amount received from all sources was $3,852 30. In this amount is included the following sums: From Merced Branch, $300; from Santa Cruz Branch, $100; from Petaluma, $101; from Gilroy, $87; from Hollister, $100; from Branches of Smartsville and vicinity, $476; from Martinez Branch, $75; from Parnell Branch of Oakland, $172 25; from Lone Mountain Branch $75; from J. O. H. Branch, No. 1, $25; from Mission Flat, $91 25; from John Hoyt, Walker River, $100; from soldiers and citizens of Benicia, $94 50; from soldiers of Angel Island, $43. Total, $1,738. The total also includes the sums received at the Davitt reception and ball, $1,000. The expenditure account showed that $1,033 47 was remitted to Ireland; $152 50 expenses of hall rent, advertising meetings and so forth for the Branch, and $800, expenses of Davitt reception, return ticket, etc., leaving a balance of $950 to still on hand in the Branch. The Branch has nearly four hundred members, and its meetings are well organized and well attended.

At the meeting on last Monday evening a communication was read from Thomas Brennan, one of the Irish agitators, now in Paris, informing the League of the point to which money in aid of the Land League had been sent. February 2nd, on the 10th day of March, we, the undersigned, met in mass meeting of our fellow-citizens in this city, were unanimous in the resolve to carry out the objects herein set forth.

We earnestly invite your cordial co-operation in the good work.

Presence of Mind.

Presence of mind is often shown in quick conception of some device or expedient, such as we usually suppose to be an emanation of superior intellect. This has been repeatedly exemplified in rencontres with the insane.

A lady was one day sitting in her drawing-room alone when the only other inmate of the house, a brother, who for a time had been betraying a tendency to unsoundness of mind, entered with a carving knife in his hand, and, shutting the door, came up to her and said:

"Margaret, an old idea has occurred to me. I wish to paint the head of John the Baptist, and I think yours might make an excellent study for it."

The lady looked at her brother's eye, and, seeing in it no token of jest, concluded that he meant to do as he said. There was an open window and a balcony by her side, with a street in front; but a moment satisfied her that safety did not lie in that way. So, putting on a smiling countenance, she said with the greatest apparent cordiality:

"That is a strange idea, George; but would it not be a pity to spoil this pretty face upon it? have got! I'll just step to my room to put it off, and be with you in half a minute."

Without waiting to give him time to consider, she stepped lightly across the floor and passed out.

In another moment she was safe in her own room, whence she easily got to the alarm, and the madman was secured.

A lady one day saw two of her children, one about five and the other about four years old, outside the parrot window, which they were busily employed in rubbing with their handkerchiefs, in imitation of a person whom they had seen a few days before cleaning the windows. They had clambered over the balcony which had been intended to secure them from danger. The lady stood a little apart and called gently to them and beds them come in. They saw no appearance of hurry in their mamma; so they took their time, climbed the bars, and landed safely in the room.

Fancy Points in Poultry.

At most of our poultry exhibitions, "fancy points," for years past, have too often taken the place of utility. If a fowl's feathers were of precisely such a number and length, and showed just such colors or markings, it was sure to take a prize. It was never asked which was the earliest to mature, gave the greatest weight of flesh for the food consumed, or what was the quality of that flesh, whether tender, juicy and savory, or dry, hard, and comparatively tasteless. Neither was it asked if pullets began to lay at an early age, or how many eggs a fowl of my ten, twenty, or more hens averaged per annum, or what the weight and quality of those eggs were, or whether the fowls were hardy, thrifty, and easily kept.

We observe that great complaints are now made in Boston, that the supply of poultry, mainly by breeders of choice poultry, in consequence of their giving "fancy points" rather than for those of profit and utility, of fast, egg, and other desirable qualities. They declare that several of their choice breeds have been almost entirely ruined in consequence of the poultry society adopting these foolish arbitrary "fancy points." This is especially the case with the famous Dorking, the best table fowl, upon the whole, probably, that Europe has yet produced.

Our Young Folks.

A Boy's Voyage on an Iceberg.

A little iceberg, rising some ten feet above the water, was noticed floating down the bay by some persons standing on the Clifton wharf yesterday. Presently they perceived a white animal running about on the ice. Nobody knew what kind of animal it was, and speculation was rife over it. It was not large enough for a Polar bear—but nobody thought it could be a less formidable beast than a "sea dog." The ice floated nearer the shore, and the animal sprang ashore and charged for the group of men. They scattered. Some one got a closer look, and perceived that the animal was a large Spitz dog and almost frightened out of his wits. Nobody recognized it at distance. How the dog got on the ice is a mystery, but, from its condition, it is believed to have been there several days.—New York Sun.

A Hawk and a Rattlesnake.

My morning on the spur of change that it must have taken to mold the scene to its present aspect was broken in upon by a most unfortunate gliding out on a bare rock within fifty feet of the point where I was sitting. He seemed to search around like a dog for a cheer to suit his snakeship, and then stretched himself out to enjoy the warmth. I was thinking if it was worth while to heave a stone at the monster, when a big shadow swept down and a hawk nearly caught him sapping, but not quite. The snake sprang his rattle and coiled himself ready for attack, while the hawk, hovering, swung a dash, now on the right and now on the left. It was quite an interesting pastime, but at last the snake made a spring and apparently failed to strike, and before he could recoil himself the hawk seized him with both talons close behind the head. In fast, he had him by the neck, and swept into the air, while the snake struggled and twisted, away up into the blue skies, in wide circling sweeps, until the struggling reptile hung limp and lifeless, when the hawk came down to the earth again, and, alighting on a neighboring tree, made his meal on the snake.—Arizona Globe Chronicle.

Fruits of Virtue.

If you should see a man digging in a snowdrift with the expectation of finding valuable ore, or planting seeds upon the rolling billows, you would say at once that he was I said himself. But in what respect does the man differ from you, while you sow the seeds of idleness and dissipation in your youth, and expect the fruits of age will be a good constitution, elevated affections, and holy affections, and holy principles! If you desire a virtuous and happy life, in youth you must shape your character by the word of unerring wisdom, and plant in your bosom the seeds of virtue.

Regulations for Lent.

The following regulations for the observance of Lent were read in all the churches throughout this Archdiocese on Sunday last:

All the week days of Lent, from Ash Wednesday to Easter Sunday, are fast days of precept on one meal, with the allowance of a moderate collation.

The precept of fasting implies also that of abstinence from the use of flesh meat. But dispensation the use of flesh meat is allowed in this Diocese during Lent, except on the following days, to wit: The Wednesdays and Fridays, the Ember days, the Thursday and Saturday of Holy Week and the Eve of the Ascension, on which days there is no leave to use flesh meat except by dispensation from the respective pastors, which they are hereby authorized to grant in cases of necessity. All Saturdays are also days of abstinence, but not of obligation.

The promiscuous use of fish and flesh meat at the same meal is forbidden in Lent, even on Sundays.

It should be carefully observed that according to an answer of the Sacred Congregation of the Holy Office, to the Bishops of England in 1860, and to the Bishops of Ireland in 1877, the Holy See has never consented to have introduced the use of milk, butter, and still less of cheese, at the evening collation on fast days; but owing to the peculiar condition of the faithful in this Province, the Holy See has kindly consented to tolerate in it the use of milk, butter and cheese in a small quantity, says, however, excepted. But persons not bound to fast are not subject to the above restrictions.

The use of lard or other fat condiment is forbidden in Lent and other fast days during the year, except when meat is allowed, and on Good Friday eggs and all lactiferous substances are forbidden throughout the day.

Some prayers at option are recommended during Lent, particularly on those days in which flesh meat is used.

Lent being a penitential time the pastors are requested to lay before the faithful the importance of complying with their Easter duty, which may be fulfilled from the first Sunday of Lent; they will frequently and earnestly improve upon their memories the sacrilege of attending, before all other things, to the salvation of their souls, and they will admit them to the faithful discharge of their Christian duties, the only things that can lead to an the everlasting happiness of heaven. For this purpose they will hold religious exercises in the churches several times a week, according to what their prudence may deem expedient.

The Monks of the Spade.

About six miles from Rome, after issuing from the gates of St. Paul, is the famous convent of the Trappist monks in the midst of the Campagna. Here the cowled friars will show you three fountains, and with a tin dipper give you a drink from each, which are said to mark the spots where St. Paul's Paul's head touched the ground when he was beheaded. This place, which as late as 1873 was deadly to men, has since then been made healthy by the labors of the friars.

The success of their efforts has this year induced the Government of Italy to send 170 of the criminals confined in the penitentiaries of Ostbotallo and Civita Vecchia to cultivate the neighboring fields under the instruction of the friars. It is an interesting experiment, as its success would relieve the nation from a heavy expense. There are 80,000 criminals in the prisons of Italy, 50,000 of whom are strong men. These men, whose labor within the prison yields very little, and whose maintenance costs annually $6,000,000, could transform the Roman Campagna into a lovely and healthy garden; could drain the immense tracts of marshy lands in Italy; construct new ports, new penitentiaries and fortifications.

St. Bernard said to them: "Spread over the world and win the kingdom of Heaven with the spade." They understood this, at first, as an order to perpetually dig their own graves, and a supplement to the "Brother, remember that you must die," which were the only words permitted them.

But of late years they have remembered that the spade is used to cultivate the earth as well as dig graves, and have converted the grounds near the abbey into a beautiful garden. It is no longer so unhealthy, and every fresh effort at cultivation aids in conquering the fever, which is the chief enemy of the spot.

Their number is now reduced to thirty, nearly all of whom are Frenchmen; and yet, even with this number, they might have cultivated more of the large tract of land they own around the monastery if they had possessed greater capacity for labor. But seeing these waste, unhealthy lands around them, they proposed to the Government the formation of a colony of prisoners whom they would instruct in their method of cultivation.

This was the origin, it is said, of the penal colony on the Campagna, which seems to offer a new prospect of revenue and improvement. Already the Government, on its own account, has drained a large tract of land in Sardinia by the labor of the prisoners. The land that previously was unproductive and insalubrious is converted into a fragrant and beautiful garden, and when solid will yield a large sum of money. Similar labors will be made from time to time on the Campagna, and already we dream of seeing that mystic, green desert covered with orchards and vineyards and white villas.

A Singular Fact.

The romance of one of Boston's twenty brick houses is told by one of the papers: "Nearly thirty years ago a young man built it for his bride, intending to mortgage it and pay for it gradually, as his worldly goods increased, to all of which she agreed. When the wedding day was appointed, trousseau ready and the house furnished, he took the lady out to inspect it. After going over the house he presented her with a deed of it for a wedding gift. Knowing the circumstances she was astonished that he had actually paid for it. He explained that, buying a ticket in the lottery, he had drawn the first prize, which just covered the cost of the house. The Puritan maiden protested she would not take a home obtained by gambling, and refused the deed. His arguments were of no avail; she remained obdurate. When they left the house he locked the door and threw the key in the brook near by. The next day he boarded up the windows, and only the spiders and mice have ever since occupied it. The man never married; he became rich, but is a wanderer on the face of the earth. The woman never married—she is still living, poor and an invalid.

St. Joseph's Academy, Oakland.

The Rev. Brother Bentlin, Superior of the Christian Brothers on this coast, recently completed his inspection and examination of St. Joseph's Academy, Oakland. Though perfectly satisfied that the establishment is in zealous and efficient hands, his office as Visitor of the Order makes it incumbent on him to institute periodically a searching inquiry into its actual condition, taking special account of the modes of instruction employed and the degree of progress effected in the various studies of the students. The object of this salutary rule of the Christian Brothers is to uphold and confirm whatever has proved satisfactory and excellent in the work of their schools and colleges; to make good all shortcomings and defects; to remove whatever may be found wrong, objectionable or unsound; and, in short, to introduce and enforce whatever improvements may be deemed best suited to attain the ends of a true education. The examinations in their institutions are, therefore, of a pattern somewhat different from those usually made by the directors and superintendents of public schools. They consist of something more than a formal visit and a few stock questions on leading generalities. The plan of making the examination a reality and not (as it is in too many places) a sham, may have its inconvenience, but it has also its advantages. For one thing, it is well calculated to frustrate any attempt at passing off the superficial for the solid, and it effectually exposes the absurdity of relying for success on "cram" and such like patent methods. During the examinations held from time to time by the Brother Visitor, the class teachers feel that the merit or demerit of their own work, as well as that of the students, is being impartially tested, which is no small incentive to having that work done in a complete and thorough manner.

St. Joseph's Academy began its career as a select Boarding School only a few months ago, and yet Brother Bentlin did not think four days too long for its official inspection. It is gratifying to be enabled to state that he found its condition to be highly satisfactory. The young students have still, of course, a great part of the hill of knowledge to climb; but their progress so far gives evidence of no small degree of native talent and well-directed effort. Apart from the general excellence of the answering, the gentlemanly deportment and fraternal feeling apparent among the boys would strike one as a highly commendable feature of the institution, and as not the least of its attractions. In fact, St. Joseph's is fast vindicating its claim to the title of being, in every sense, a first-class Home Academy for youths of tender years. In wishing it a continuance and increase of its present prosperity, we but echo the desire of every true friend of Christian education on the coast.

SUCCESS IN BOREHEES.

The Career of a New Jersey Organ-Builder.

Success in business is undoubtedly the result of indefatigable and enterprising effort. It is said that the Hon. Daniel F. Beatty, of Washington, N. J., began business in 1860 minus one dollar. Since that time he has built up an enormous Piano and Organ trade all over the civilized world by his remarkable pluck and enterprise. His attention was early turned to the field in this way he became interested in the sale, and finally in the manufacture of musical instruments. A sketch of Mr. J. D., which best his success, will be found in a small pink, but very pleasant little book, which he has published, which we find quoted in his advertisement in another column. He has spared no money and expense in this project. By the shrewd, skillful and persistent newspaper advertising he has attracted wide attention everywhere, so that at the present his instruments are in use in all parts of the civilized world. He believes in the free use of printer's ink, and it has paid him a thousand-fold.

Mr. Beatty is the man who first conceived the idea of reducing the prices of Pianos and Organs. He commenced to expose the deception practiced by leading manufacturers, who asked $600 for an instrument that could be sold for $300, and still leave a fair profit, or $1,000 for a Piano that $375 is sufficient for. Then the war began. He was ridiculed and misrepresented in a shameful manner by the monopolists, whose large profits were in danger. No stone was left unturned to defeat and ruin him. Circulars were printed and sent out and circulated by their agents, Articles were published in music trade journals, and many other dirty tricks were resorted to. But, by the energy of right and justice, Mayor Beatty has succeeded in reducing the prices of Pianos and Organs, so that he is said to be the largest manufacturer of Pianos and Organs in the music business.

But, and in the rich and triumphant of a vast business Mr. Beatty never forgets the duties of a man and a father. He has twice been elected Mayor of Washington without his own seeking, which often he has done. He has never allowed his name to be used for any office, but he has been elected him. He conducted no campaign whatever, and was not even at home on election day. His generous donation of orders upon the largest local stores to his poor friends during the past winter, and his liberal contributions to the various religious organizations, without regard to creed, or nationality, are indicative of but a few of the many instances that are continually occurring, and which have made him universally popular among his fellow-citizens.

Man who have won for themselves honorable distinction in their particular avocations in life, are widely known. And as the economical public seek out the best, they are apt to possess all the qualifications necessary for the high position of public trust, and force the unknown from which the Nation drawn its best supporters. Mayor Beatty's career thus far has been marked by unbiased generosity, indomitable will, acute perception, and good, sound common sense.

The Famous Opera Singers.

Annie Louise Cary and Clara Louise Kellogg are beyond question the most famous opera singers of modern times. In fact they are universally acknowledged to be the leaders of their profession, as well as before of large experience and popularity with the public. They have probably traveled more extensively than any ladies on the stage, and, as a consequence, have had numerous opportunities of judging of the merits of different countries and their productions. It is certainly a very great credit to California, and her balmy, semi-tropical climate in particular, that these two world-famous Slavers Vocentis Cologne by far the best they have ever tried in any other country. For sale by all druggists.

They Work Together.

When your system gets out of tune and you feel completely played out, it is pretty certain that you need a medicine to set on both the kidneys and liver, for these important organs work together in freeing the system of its waste, and neither can do their work alone. Take Kidney-Wort, for this is just what it does, for it is both diuretic and cathartic.

An Arrangement Effected Between the Boers and British.

LONDON, March 22.—In the House of Commons to-day Gladstone said the Government had received a telegram from General Sir Evelyn Wood stating that an arrangement had been made with the Boers, who substantially accept the British conditions. The announcement was received with loud cheers. The conditions, Gladstone said, are the suzerainty of the Queen, British control of foreign relations and the establishment of a British resident at the future Capital. The Boers, however, are promised complete self-government. A Royal Commission, consisting of Lieutenant-General Sir Hercules Robinson, General Sir Evelyn Wood and Sir John Hi, Daville, will be appointed to consider the position of the territory eastward within a certain limit, which shall be severed from the Transvaal. The conditions also provide for the disposal of the Boers forthwith and the temporary maintenance of British garrisons, which, however, are not to interfere with local affairs. General Wood promises not to advance or send troops above into the Transvaal.

A dispatch from Pretoret Hill, Natal, says that an armistice of forty-eight hours has been concluded in order to terminate negotiations. The terms of the truce are that all arms, ammunition and other property captured by either side during the hostilities shall be restored; that Transvaal shall be granted independence, subject to the conditions to be hereafter settled by the Royal Commission, and that the Boer Government shall commence after the Commission shall have made its report. Meanwhile, British garrisons are to remain in the Transvaal without interfering or interfering with local affairs. The Boer forces will disperse forthwith, and Capt. Elliott's messenger is to be delivered up to Joubin.

A dispatch from Pretoria (Natal) says: A final interview, at which the negotiations between General Wood and the Boers will be completed, will take place to-morrow. It is stated that the Royal Commission will meet at Heidelberg. The armistice, probably, will be formally prolonged twenty-four hours, pending the final settlement.

Stage Information at the Transvaal Peace Discussed Sick.

CHICAGO, March 23.—A London special says: Rumors of peace with the Boers in the Transvaal is not received with satisfaction by the Jingo element of the Conservative party. They positively speak of it as a peace with dishonor, and assert that it is in every particular discreditable to the Government and the nation. The leading organ of the Conservative party, for instance, that time alone can tell how the abandonment of the Transvaal in the face of rebellion will affect our interests in Africa and elsewhere. The "peace at any price" party decide what they term the imposition of sentiment into the question. They refuse to look forward or take into account the probable consequences. Once more to an end only say that was it not thus that this Empire was built up, and yet, piece by piece, together. What we get by the sword we must in a great measure keep by the sword. What if we begin to give up here and retreat there, it must be said at least that we have abandoned a place once brought us to the point which we have reached. Under any circumstances the peace concluded at Prospect Hill is fraught with ugly possibilities for our rule, not in South Africa alone, but in other regions of our Empire as well. Concluded after a check which, if it be to our arms, it will be an actual incentive to all who would cast away to overthrow it if they can.

Great fears are entertained for the health of Lord Beaconsfield. His friends are apprehensive that his present illness may prove fatal.

Harcourt Secured.

A STRONG STATEMENT VINDICATED. Mr. W. E. Clarke of Providence, R. I., a person very much concerning his Kidney medicine, HUNT'S REMEDY, the strong statement that "it was never known to fail. Now did he dare to say so much? How did he know it to be true? Because HUNT'S REMEDY, the Great Kidney and Liver Medicine, proved itself to be a positive cure for Bright's Disease of the Kidneys; and he knew that a medicine that would accomplish that, would cure any ailment of the Kidneys, Bladder, Liver, or Urinary Organs. And this has proved the statement perfectly true.

—FROM—

IRELAND

A British Land Leaguer.

LONDON, March 25.—At a meeting in this city to-night Parnell said it was desirable to form an association in England and Scotland for the purpose of forwarding the objects of the Land League. It was not intended to conflict with the Home Rule organization which would still remain in existence. The English land question, he thought, was not at present ripe for settlement, but anything achieved in Ireland would probably affect the labors of England and Scotland. It was impossible for the Government to finally settle the Irish land question, but any proposals, tending to ameliorate the condition of tenants would be accepted. By means of the proposed organization, they could, as in America, educate public opinion in England and Scotland. Parnell said, is flowing from America to Ireland at the rate of £4,000 weekly. Resolutions were adopted in favor of forming a National Land League of Great Britain, with Justin McCarthy as President, to assist the Irish Land League to reduce the rack rents and enable the Irish tenant-farmers to become owners of their holdings on reasonable terms. That the best way to attain these objects is by taking practical steps to cultivate English public opinion.

GLADSTONE MAKES PEACE WITH PARNELL—SYNOPSIS OF THE NEW LAND BILL.

NEW YORK, March 27.—The Herald's London special says: It is believed the Government has come to an understanding with the Parnellite Party, who, on their part, have, I understand, given up further intentions of assisting the Conservatives in the contested elections. Overtures of peace were made, I believe, from the Treasury benches, at a meeting which was held yesterday, at Westminster Hotel. Mr. Parnell said that the purpose of the new organization which he proposed to create, was to educate the opinion of all the English world, and other Irish members, have made arrangements to address a number of meetings in Great Britain, during the Easter recess, on Mr. Gladstone's Land bill, and the necessity of modifying the existing Parliamentary representation in England and Ireland. During the same recess, Mr. Parnell intends to visit his held in Ireland, at which as many members of Parliament as can be spared from England will attend. The Government proposes, I hear, attached by the Parnellites to the English amendment, the measure derived from them will strengthen the hands of the Government in forcing the Land bill through the House of Lords. The Land bill meet unanimous expression of Irish opinion could exact.

It is rumored, on good authority, that the Government Land bill will not offer the Irish tenants fixture of tenure, though it will afford increased stability of tenure, so that it will contain a clause drawn on the lines of last year's Disturbance bill, but increase the fine payable by landlords who are adjudged guilty by the Courts of arbitrary eviction, and compensation for losses to murder certain other parties. The charge against Walsh is for inciting others to intimidate certain of her Majesty's subjects, with a view to compelling them to quit their lawful employments. It appears that Boyton was arrested at Kildare in the house of a friend named Heffernan. He was accompanied by Inspector Purdon and several police constables. Keogh, against whom the charge is also one of intimidation, was conveyed to Dublin by the same train that was due at Kingsbridge at ten o'clock. A large number of persons assembled at the Kingsbridge station, where a considerable force of Metropolitan police was present. There were very few of the members of the Land League present. Mr. Dillon, M.P., arrived at the railway station shortly before the train arrived, but he was refused admission. When the train arrived there was a great rush of people towards the platform, and a rush from the platform by second class carriage in which Boyton and Keogh, with their police escorts, travelled. Considerable jostling took place, but no hurt as he walked across the platform to a cab that was in waiting. Three constables entered the cab with him, a detective took a seat beside the driver of the vehicle, and preceded by some half a dozen of Metropolitan police to the cab was driven out of the station followed by a cheering crowd. Keogh was conveyed to the jail in a similar fashion in a cab, but as he was not generally known the greater part of the demonstration was directed to Boyton. Keogh by taking practical steps to cultivate English public opinion.

St. Joseph's Academy, Oakland.

The Rev. Brother Botheliu, Superior of the Christian Brothers on this coast, recently completed his inspection and examination of St. Joseph's Academy, Oakland. Though perfectly satisfied that the establishment is in sound and efficient hands, his office as Visitor of the Order makes it incumbent on him to institute periodically a searching inquiry into its actual condition, taking special account of the modes of instruction employed and the degree of progress effected in the various studies of the students. The object of this salutary rule of the Christian Brothers is to uphold and confirm whatever has proved satisfactory and excellent in the work of their schools and colleges; to make good all shortcomings and defects; to remove whatever may be found wrong, objectionable or unsound; and, in short, to introduce and enforce whatever improvements may be deemed best suited to attain the ends of a true education. The examinations in their institutions are, therefore, of a pattern somewhat different from those usually made by the directors and superintendents of public schools. They consist of something more than a formal visit and a few stock questions on leading generalities. The plan of making the examination a reality and not (as it is in too many places) a sham, may have its inconveniences, but it has also its advantages. For one thing, it is well calculated to frustrate any attempt at passing off the superficial for the solid, and it effectually exposes the absurdity of relying for success on "cram" and such like patent methods. During the examinations held from time to time by the Brother Visitor, the class teachers feel that the merit or defect of their own work, as well as that of the students, is being impartially tested, which is no small incentive to have their work done in a complete and thorough manner.

St. Joseph's Academy began its career as a select Boarding School only a few months ago, and yet Brother Botheliu did not think four days too long for its official inspection. It is gratifying to be enabled to state that he found its condition to be highly satisfactory. The young students have still, of course, a great part of the hill of knowledge to climb; but their progress so far gives evidence of no small degree of native talent and well-directed effort. Apart from the general excellence of the management, the gentlemanly deportment and fraternal feeling apparent among the boys would strike one as a highly commendable feature of the institution, and as not the least of its attractions. In fact, St. Joseph's is fast rendering its claim to the title of being, in every sense, a first-class Home Academy for youths of tender years. In wishing it a continuance and increase of its present prosperity, we but echo the desire of every true friend of Christian education on the coast.

SUCCESS IN BUSINESS.

The Career of a New Jersey Organ-Builder.

Success in business is undoubtedly the result of intelligence, pluck and enterprise. It is said that the Hon. Daniel F. Beatty, of Washington, N. J., began business in 1860 without one dollar. Since that time he has built up an enormous Piano and Organ trade and made the trilliums world by his remarkable pluck and enterprise. His attention was early turned to music, and in this way he became interested in the sale, and finally in the manufacture of musical instruments at Washington, N. J., which bear his name. His first operations were on a small scale, but his active and progressive mind saw wide fields open to energy and enterprise. He has never wavered, faltered in this project. By his shrewd, skilful and persistent newspaper advertising he has attracted wide attention everywhere so that at the present his instruments are in use in all parts of the civilized world. He believes in the free use of printer's ink, and it has paid him a thousand-fold.

Mr. Beatty is the man who first conceived the idea of reducing the prices of Pianos and Organs. He at once began to expose the deception practiced by leading manufacturers, who asked $450 for an Organ that could be sold for $60, and still leave a fair profit, or $1,000 for a Piano that $300 is sufficient for. Then the war began. He was ridiculed and misrepresented in a shameful manner by the monopolists, whose large profits were in danger. No stone was left unturned to defeat and ruin him. Circulars were printed and sent out and circulated by their agents. Articles were published in music trade journals, and many other dirty tricks were resorted to. But, by the course of right and justice, Mayor Beatty has succeeded in reducing the prices of Pianos and Organs, so that he is said to be by far the most successful man that has ever engaged in the music business.

But amid the rush and hurry of a vast business Mr. Beatty never forgets the duties of a man and citizen. He has twice been elected Mayor of Washington without his own seeking, which office he now holds. His fellow-citizens chose him. He conducted no campaign whatever, and was not even at home on election day. His generous donation of orders upon the largest local stores to supply the sick poor during the past winter, and his liberal contributions to the various religious organizations, without regard to denominations, are indicative of but a few of the many methods that are continually transpiring, and which have made him exceedingly popular among his fellow-citizens.

Men who have won for themselves honorable distinction in their particular occasions in life, and which we dominate as the successful self-made men of the day, are apt to possess all the qualifications necessary for the high position of public trust, and form the nucleus from which the Nation draws its best supporters. Mayor Beatty's career thus far has been marked by untiring perseverance, indomitable will, acute perception, and good, sound common sense.

The Famous Opera Singers.

Annie Louise Cary and Clara Louise Kellogg are beyond question the most famous opera singers of modern times. In fact they have been universally acknowledged to be the leaders of their profession, as well as leaders of large experience and particularly good taste. They have probably traveled more extensively than any ladies on the stage, and, as a consequence, they had excellent opportunities of judging of the merits of different countries and their productions. It is certainly a very great result to California and the balmy, semi-tropical climate of the Pacific, to have had their prominence Sierra Vesuvius Cologne by far the best they have ever used in any other country. For sale by all druggists.

They Work Together.

When your system gets out of tune and you feel completely played out, it is pretty certain that you need a medicine that on both the kidneys and liver, for these important organs work together in freeing the system of its waste, and keeping up the tone. They take Kidney-Wort, for this is just what it does, for it is both diuretic and cathartic.

An Announcement Elicited Between the Boers and British.

LONDON, March 22. In the House of Commons to-day Chadstone stated that Government had received a telegram from General Sir Evelyn Wood stating that an arrangement had been made with the Boers, who substantially accept the British conditions. The announcement was received with loud cheers. The conditions, Chadstone said, are the sovereignty of the Queen, British control of foreign relations and the establishment of a British resident at the future capital. The Boers, however, are to have complete self-government. A Royal Commission, consisting of Lorenzo General Sir Hercules Robinson, General Sir Evelyn Wood and Sir Julian H. Daudiler, will be appointed to consider the position of the territory eastward within a certain limit, which shall be secured from the Transvaal. The conditions also provide for the disposal of the Boers fait hfulness and the temporary maintenance of British garrisons, which, however, are not to interfere with local affairs. General Wood promises not to advance or send warlike stores into the Transvaal.

A dispatch from Prospect Hill, Natal, says that an armistice of forty-eight hours has been concluded in order to terminate negotiations. The terms of the truce are that if arms, ammunitions and other property captured by either side at the battle of Ingogo shall be received that Transvaal shall be granted independence, subject to the conditions to be hereafter settled by the Royal Commission, and that the Boer Government shall commence after the Commission shall have made its report. Meanwhile, British garrisons are to remain in the Transvaal without in any way interfering with local affairs. The Boer forces will disperse forthwith, and Cant. Elliott's hospital is to be delivered up to contract.

A dispatch from Newcastle (Natal) says: A good interest, as it is hoped, will be made between General Wood and the Boers will be completed, will take place to-morrow. It is stated that the Royal Commission will meet at Heidelberg. The armistice, probably, will be formally prolonged two months, pending the final settlement.

Dingo Indignation at the Transvaal Peace Diplomacy.

CHICAGO, March 22.—A Pensacola special says: News of the peace with the Boers of Transvaal is not received with satisfaction by the Dingo element of the Conservative party. They predict and speak of it as a peace with dishonor, and assert that it is a very particular discreditable to the Government and to the nation. The leading organs of the Conservative party say, in substance, that the abandonment of Egypt, and now the abandonment of the Transvaal in the face of violence will affect our interests in Africa and elsewhere. The "peace at any price" party declare what they term the importation of sentiment into the question. They refuse to look forward and take into account the probable consequences. Once more we learn, they say, that what is it claims that this Empire was built up, and put, piece by piece, together. What we get by the sword we must, in a great measure keep by the sword. What if we begin to give up here and retreat there, it must be said at least that we have altered the plan which brought us to the point which we have reached. Under any circumstances the peace concluded at Prospect Hill is fraught with ugly possibilities for our rule, not in South Africa alone, but in other regions of our Empire as well. Concluded after a series of mishaps to our arms, it will be an actual incentive to all who dislike our sway to overthrow it if they can.

WANTED.

A Strong Statement Vindicated. Mr. Wm. C. Clarke, of Providence, R. I., several years ago made, concerning his Kidney medicine, HUNT'S REMEDY, the strong statement that "it was never known to fail." How did he dare to say so? How did he know it to be the truth? Because HUNT'S REMEDY, the Great Kidney and Liver Medicine, proved itself to be a positive cure for Bright's Disease of the Kidneys, and he knew that a medicine that would accomplish that, would cure any ailment of the Kidneys, Bladder, Liver, or Urinary organs. And this has proved the statement perfectly true. Sold by all Druggists. Trial size, 75 cents.

—I had no faith in your potent medicine for diseases of the Kidneys until I tried it, and convinced myself of a complete. Hat the Doctors prescribed incurable. These are the words of thousands who have used the Pat Kidney Pad.

Poetry.

UNCONQUERED.

March 17, 1881.

BY M. D. KELLY.

Flags of our sires! than which more fair
Never were kissed the sunlit air,
Or floated in the shadows where War maddened homes,
Unfurl again thy green and gold
As proudly now as when of old
Our fathers stood legently each fold,
A race of yeomen.

For since thy makers from the sky
Brought down the golden tints that dye
Thy silken fold, and beautify
Its harp and crown,
No stain has ever come to mar
That flag which has been borne afar,
In storm and sunshine, peace and war,
The wide world over.

Out on the lying lips that say
Thy sovereign hour has passed away
Though forced by despots to obey
A cursed alliance,
Harmless like, thy sons have shrinked
The swords their ancestors bequeathed,
But Irish lips have ever breathed
Thy foes defiance.

Ask of the tyrants who have known
The hate rebellious hearts have shown,
Nor felt secure upon their throne
In wars or wassels, —
Ask for their blessings who have seen
The red flag flying from the green,
If Hohenzollern ever been
The Saxon's vassals!

What care we for the maps and lines
Wherewith geography defines
A nation's limits! these are signs
To guide the seaman:
A people live while they possess
Their fathers' fair and manliness,
And he who wears a rebel's dress,
Is still a freeman.

Old flag! to thee in other days
Our voices sang their hymns of praise,
Our hands upbore thee in the ways
Of brave and jubilant:
To-day, no fall of marching feet
Disturbs the quiet of the street,
We harps thy echoes in the sweet
In joyful distinct.

But mourn not for the loss of these!
Unfurl thy colors to the breeze!
Thy song was dwell by many seas,
Have every to sunder
The eyes that bind their country's limbs;
And when you hear thy lusty hymns,
They'll march to rhythm of merry hymns
Thy green folds under.

—The Pilot.

Mother and Wife.

BY A. H. STODDART.

A clock on the mantel had just chimed one short, musical stroke.

Through the half-closed blinds shone the silvery light of the fast waning moon; the candle had burned low in its socket; the log of wood had not cortled itself to ashes; but of all this Dr. Frank Stanley saw or heard nothing, as he sat in his office-chair, lost in the night.

It was with him now as it had been with him for hours past, since the moment he had placed his fate in May Falkland's keeping and she had accepted it.

No wonder that it all seemed new and strange to him—that he was heedless of time and space.

She was such a delicate, high-born girl, and he—ah! another vision came before him now.

Not the cheerful house with its luxurious appointments—he might at least offer May a home worthy of her—but the memory of the days when he had run, a little, bare-footed lad, about his mother's cottage, and she, toiling for her only child, had earned one by one the dollars which had paid for his first to the village school and then to the great city to learn the profession for which he longed.

He had succeeded well and bravely, beyond his most ambitious hopes; but the mother who had toiled for him—where was she?

Why was it to-night that her old wrinkled face drove even May Falkland's beauty from him?

True, he had no longer allowed her to work; true, she sat at ease in her little cottage, thinking of, and praying for, her boy, who was so good and generous to her; but was it his fault that his patients were so many, and his hours so precious, that he could find no time to gladden her old heart by a glimpse of him now and then?

And now—now that the thought of May as his wife—May, with her high-bred ways—May, whose every association was in such a widely different sphere—should it be that he was ashamed of his mother?

The candle died out entirely; the wood was white with ashes now; the moon had sunk to rest; the clock chimed two; but a red-hot flush burned on Dr. Stanley's cheek as he rose to find his way up to his room and bed, and perhaps forgetfulness in sleep.

For three long hours he sought the boon in vain; and when at last it came to him, and his tired eyes closed, how could he but dream of those other eyes just awakening in the far-off home, which somehow to-night had so persistently haunted his thoughts!

In the little college all was bustle, for Mrs. Stanley had determined to give her boy a surprise, and the train started very early.

It lay ten long hours away.

It would be almost nightfall when she arrived.

How glad Frank would be to see her!

He had never supposed her coming, because he had thought she would not find the courage, as though for his sake she would not do or dare anything!

She was sorry now she had not had the village dressmaker make up the black silk he had sent her, but it looked so grand in its lustrous folds that it seemed a pity to touch it with a scissors, and she would seem more natural like to Frank in her staff dress.

How often had she pictured him in his lonely home!

She hoped he might be out when she arrived, that she might take off her bonnet, and, slipping on her white cap, let him find her, quietly sitting by the fireside, waiting his return.

All the way in the train, when at last she had started on her journey, she could hardly keep her happy thoughts to herself, and more than one glanced at the smiling old face with something tugging at their heart strings which almost brought moisture into their eyes.

It was quite nightfall when the city was reached.

There had been some slight delay on the road, and the old lady felt a sinking at the leave heart which had prompted her mission.

However, she soon succeeded in finding a cabman willing to take her to the address she held in her hand.

"It must be a mistake, or he has brought me to the wrong place. Oh! dear, what shall I do!" she sighed, as he drew rein before a large, handsome house.

But calmly reassured her, and she soon found herself, surrounded by boxes and bundles, facing the fashionable gentleman who opened the door.

Save for a suspicious shortness of a portion of his attire, which reached only to his knees, where they were met by stiff leather leggings, the worthy woman would have dropped him a courtesy.

"Past the doctor's office hours, ma'am," he said, in response to her feeble appeal. "It's as much as my place is worth to take in your card.

"But I have no card. He'll see me. I'm I'm—"

But she did not finish the sentence, only stepped inside the door, and stood under the full glare of the light of the hall lamp.

Her bonnet was crushed and bent, her dress bore evidence of the dust of travel, and in her hand was a huge band-box containing the bonnet which was to astonish the Londoners.

"Indeed, ma'am—," the man began, but the old lady walked steadily on to the door, beneath whose threshold she descried a stream of light.

The hot blush had by this time died out of Dr. Stanley's cheeks.

The morning dawn had dissipated the foolish fancies of the night.

His duties for the day were over, and he was free to seek May, whose wonderful eyes would light up as he entered, and whose lips would, perhaps, brush his cheeks with their velvet softness.

He sprang to his feet to seek her, when the door softly opened, and turning he saw—could it be a dream conjured up by his restless fancies of the night he see!—his mother.

Close behind her was the wholly-wondering, half-apologetic face of his butler.

It took him a full minute to realize it was no dream, and then—hence of this manhood!—a sudden overwhelming tenderness swept all else, and with a glad cry of "Mother!" he clasped her to his heart.

When she had grown calmer and more at rest, beginning to look around and admire, a little feeling of irritation began to grow at his heart.

Why had she come?

Had he not made all comfortable for her at home?

Herewhe would be constrained, unnatural. And May!

Could picture the astonished look that would creep into her eyes when he said to her, "This is my mother!" nay, more, the haughty curve which would gather about her mouth so rich and sweet.

So the question at his heart found words, and he scarcely knew the innate irritation they betrayed.

"Mother, why did you not let me know you were coming?"

"I meant to surprise you, my boy," she answered fondly. "Can it be that I have made wrong?"

"No, no!" he hastily replied, "Come, you must eat and go to bed. You need a good rest."

But long after he bade her good night he sat and thought.

His mother had come to make her home with him.

That was clear.

If he told her, he willed otherwise she would obey him.

For a time he planned it out—how he would tell her the city life was not adapted to her peace, and he would find a home of the plain, humble little woman, who was not ashamed to toil with her own hands that his might be the hands of a gentleman.

Oh! shame on him.

Could he ever wash them clean even of this thought?

No; May knew the truth.

He could bear the scorn in her eyes and in her voice as she would question how he dared look up to her, but his mother should share his home and his heart to the end.

It was too late now to visit May to-night, but he went up-stairs, and, softly turning the knob of the door of the room where his mother slept, he noiselessly approached the bed, and, bending down, touched his lips to the old, withered cheek.

She started up with a glad sob of joy.

"My boy! my boy! who I thought was not glad to see his mother."

He quieted her at last, wondering why his own heart felt so light, and she fell into a sound sleep with his hand tightly clasped in hers.

"You did not come last night," said his betrothed, when next morning he stood in her presence.

"No, May," he answered. "But I come to-night to tell how unworthy I am of your love. Last night my mother came to me. May, do not stare. It was no variant from the spirit-land, but an actual reality. I have never told of my mother. Think of it—a man so blessed, and yet dumb! All her life she toiled with poverty. For whose sake, think you? Her son's—that she might make him a gentleman. Heaven prospered him, and enabled him to take all the burden from her old shoulders, and so he thought he had done his duty.

"He fed the body but let the heart starve.

"Last night, in the desperation of her hunger, she sought me out.

"For a moment—oh! better humiliation—my heart rebelled.

"Think of it, May—the cruel, unnatural pride which would bring to a man what a cheek a blush for the woman who bore him.

"I thought of you, with your pretty, dainty ways, side by side with her plain and homely ones. I knew the two could never be reconciled, and so, May, I come to ask you to forgive and forget me. My heart and my home are my mother's henceforth and forever."

The man came lingering hope that the girl before him would refuse—the sacrifice!

Certainly an added book of suffering crew into his eyes as she answered nothing, only laid her hand in his a moment, as if in farewell.

His visits seemed very long, very weary, all that day; but as he crossed the home threshold at nightfall he smoothed the frown from his brow as he said:

"She must suspect nothing."

He would find her, he was sure, in his study.

As he softly opened the door he anticipated her cry of "My boy" as she trembingly rose to greet him; but, ah! he had not anticipated the picture that met his gaze.

His mother was sitting, indeed, in the arm-chair by the fire, but at her feet, her head resting on her lap, while the old hungers carcssingly stroked the luxuriant hair, was another figure, which rose instead to welcome him.

"Frank," the sweet voice whispered in his ear, "I lost my mother when I was a lady. It has been so sweet to find one again. You and, 'Henceforth your home and heart was hers.' O my love! may we not share the blessing together?"

Why are Secret Societies an Evil,

The Church condemns secret societies in the plainest and most unequivocal manner. As Catholics we are bound to regard the Church as a divine and infallible guide in all matters concerning faith and morals. The Protestants of the sixteenth century while retaining a belief in many of the teachings of the Church, denied this principle and were therefore no longer members of the true Church.

They acted upon the theory of believing just as many of the teachings of the Church as suited them and they rejected the rest. Liberal Catholics, who are the Protestants of the nineteenth century, do exactly the same thing. Quite often they desire very much to do these things which the Church prohibits. Their worldly interests or their pleasures and passions would be greatly subserved thereby. Now a man's reason is often wonderfully influenced by what he considers his interests. So these "liberal" Catholics begin to apply their reason to the discussion of what the Church has prohibited or commanded and quickly discover, chiefly because they wish so to discover that the Church is a little too stringent or severe. The young man for instance who desires to participate in "round dances," will, perhaps reason that at least, so far as he is concerned, there is no danger—the prohibition of the Church is a little too sweeping, and should be relaxed in certain cases. It is amusing to study the chain of reasoning by which such a young man may prove he can be a Catholic and reject the authority of the Church at the same time; it is almost as ridiculous as the logic and audacity with which some High Church Episcopalians make themselves out Catholics with all their differences.

The prohibitions as well as the commands of the Church are neither arbitrary nor unreasonable. What she forbids her children to do she forbids for a good cause and for their own welfare. Even the most bitter enemies cannot help acknowledging the wisdom and good sense of her regulations. Now we find some great infidel like Huxley praising the manner in which she educates and trains her priests; no some experienced physician like Dr. Hall, commending the Catholic method of observing Lent and again some Protestant minister acknowledging the wisdom of her attitude upon education. To them it is a matter of wonder that the Church so invariably pursues what eventually turns out to be the wisest course. And this would indeed be wonderful if nothing but human wisdom directed her course, but when we consider that she is divinely inspired, there is nothing at all to be surprised at. All Catholics believe in this inspiration and those who doubt it are not Catholics no matter how persistently they may masquerade under that name!

Before answering the question "why are secret societies an evil?" it might be well to ask "why are secret societies secret?" Secrecy is sometimes necessary in national matters and in the conduct of business. Privacy is often desirable. But why a member of a private society should be bound by an oath to observe secrecy is a mystery too, that excites suspicion. If the object of a secret society is benevolence, and it have no other object why should it be secret? Benevolence need not be ostentatious, but why should it act by ways that are dark? If the object of these societies is temperance, why seek to hide the means by which that end is reached, unless there is something wrong and dishonorable in them? The truth is that secrecy is not insisted on to attain the object of benevolence, but for some other object, and that object itself is kept secret. What this secret purpose is we at length discover in the tendencies which the society creates and sometimes we get at the secret means. But may not the secret object be a worthy one? It may possibly; but experience furnishes a long chain of evidence to the contrary. The Teutonic Knights were the first to give impetus to the cause of Luther! The fostering corruption brought about by the secrecy of some military orders that sprang up from the Crusades is a matter of history. The Freemasons, originally not an un Catholic organization, began to grow bad when it became secret. The Carbonari and Internationals were for years sources of disorder and disruption to religion and society, spreading false ideas, breeding revolution and encouraging the work of assassins.

Why are secret societies secret? The question is a pertinent one and cannot be answered to the full satisfaction of secret societies themselves. Falsehood and crime hide in the dark just as naturally and as truly as Truth and Right seek the light. In times of peace, especially, it is to the advantage of all great and good purposes to be as public and as open as possible in their every feature. No grand or true object was ever conceived in darkness and secrecy. Only reptile attacks on Catholicity or concealedly blows at government demand, dark lantern conclaves and death-head emblems. And therefore both reason and experience combine to establish a presumption against objects conceived of or promoted in the dark. If the object is a worthy one the only proper way to secure it is by fair and legitimate arguments addressed to public opinion.

The theory of social life in this country makes all men free and equal and allows to Catholics no matter how persistently they may masquerade under that name!

Cheering Words for California from the Old Land. A Few Facts about the Land League. How Parnell Saved the People. No More Emigrants from Ireland. A Singular Case of "Black Diamonds" in the British Parliament.

[FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.]

DUBLIN, March 10, 1881.

EDITOR OF THE MONITOR.

DEAR FRIEND.—Allow me first of all to thank you for the time of the Monitors which you kindly sent me, and which has been read here by many persons who fully appreciate the excellent tone and the ability displayed in performing for our holy faith and the cause nearest and dearest to every patriot's heart, the Irish Land League. The enthusiasm manifested by the Irishmen of California in the cause of liberty and justice for the suffering tenant farmers of Ireland is one of the noblest traits in their character. The people of the Christian Brothers' School, were selected as the performers, under the direction of a competent committee, and the Rev. Br. Ignatius, Director of the Christian Brothers, and the leading traders of Newcastle. Professional aid was procured, and in a few weeks the performance commenced. The use of the Town Hall was secured for the purpose of the charity by Mr. Morrisy, Mayor, J. P., the gentleman who was the leading case, but his worship's decree was overruled by an order from the High Sheriff. A considerable sum of money was realized. A year after, the priests of the parish for the relief of the poor. The similarity between the cause of their native town of Newcastle and the capital of an English military district compelled the young men to attempt a harmless witticism, and to enhance the attractions of their entertainment by calling themselves "Black Diamonds," but they were simply amateur vocalists, performing under the direction of Cardinal Cullen, entirely for a charitable purpose. So long as it is possible for an English minister to be fooled by amateurs, and imagine that they are in earnest, it is simply impossible that our people can lose their faith in Home rule and Home.

CORRESPONDENCE FROM ROME.

FEBRUARY 28th, 1881.

THE HOLY FATHER—On Sunday, 20th February, the Sovereign Pontiff received, in the Throne Room, Vatican, the homage of the nobles of the Sacred College, and their congratulations on the 25th anniversary of his election to the Pontifical Throne. An eloquent and affectionate address was read to him by Cardinal Di Pietro, Dean of the Sacred College, in which reference was made to the gratification with the tenants on such estate gets a lively and tender that sum; and if the landlords will not accept it, and thus consent to take their share of the dilthem, we advise you to pay no rent at all, for it is only by the adoption of such a course that you can reasonably hope to force a settlement of the question. I may here remark, that the Government valuation of Ireland is in round numbers £10,000,000; the annual rental is £15,000,000; that, practically, the landlords were asked to reduce their rental by one-third.

I suppose your readers are already familiar with the case of "intimidation" which recently occupied the attention of the House of Commons, and in which the Chief Secretary stated that the town of Newcastle possessed a mysterious organization of young men known as the obvious suggestion being that these youths were in some way responsible for the alleged intimidation, whereby extreme magisterial skillness was rendered necessary. Ridiculous as Mr. Forster's charge appeared in days gone by, and now the spirit of disorder appears under a new shape in the guise of the Black Diamonds, Mr. Forster told the tale in good faith, no doubt; but, alas for the gullibility of the "veteran statesman," and alas for the liberties of the people placed in the committed to his charge, should his credulence in police reports continue unshaken. When the Black Diamond scare had served its purpose, the Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster, in his journey to the way back to Newcastle. The good people of the town were enraged and indignant, but they quickly prepared an explanation of the slander, and presented it to the Mayor. A year ago, when distress was rife, it was sought to organize a series of Christy Minstrel entertainments for the benefit of the poor, and the Rev. Br. Ignatius, Director of the Christian Brothers, and the leading traders of Newcastle. Professional aid was procured, and in a few weeks the performance commenced. The use of the Town Hall was secured for the purpose of the charity by Mr. Morrisy, Mayor, J. Father T. Burke, O. P.

Presentation of an Address to the Eloquent Irish Dominican.

Splendid Speech of Ireland's Pulpit Orator.

Father Thomas Burke, O.P., preached recently, at St. Anthony's Church, Liverpool, on behalf of the schools, and in the afternoon was presented with an address by the clergy and people of the mission. Although he has been ailing seriously for some time past, his appearance would seem to indicate that he is in the enjoyment of vigorous health. The enthusiasm which had to a certain extent been pent up during the previous part of the day found vent at the presentation which took place in the schools connected with the church. Notwithstanding that a charge was made for entrance, there was a crowded attendance, and Father Burke on his arrival was hailed with most lively demonstrations of joy. A brass band, whose services had been secured, struck up an inspiriting Irish national air, and the music was followed by ringing cheers and the waving of hats and handkerchiefs. The address, which bears the impress of Father Murphy's poetical imagination, was replied to by Father Burke in a speech as eloquent as forcible. Its effect on the audience was marvellous, as shown by the vehement cheers with which it was received.

PRESENTATION OF AN ADDRESS.

Amongst those present at the presentation of the address to Father Burke, were Dr. A. M. Bligh, who was moved to the chair, Ven Very Rev. Canon Clifford, the Rev. P. Muphy, etc.

After a few appropriate words from the chairman, Father Murphy read the address (which was in album form and was handsomely illuminated), prefacing it by some remarks on Father Burke's distinguished faculties as a preacher. The following is the text of the address:

TO THE VERY REV. THOMAS S. BURKE, O.P.

We, the priests and parishioners of St. Anthony's, are flattered and honored by your presence in our midst to-day, and we extend to you a real, cordial, cead mile faithe.

We feel proud of you on many grounds. You belong to that distinguished order which, from time to time, has bequeathed to the Church so many luminous names, but its white-robed founder had no brazen wire, wrestling for the grand inheritance of religion, than those whose names stand out in bold relief on the glowy pages of Irish history. The memory of St. Dominic's children clings to many a Catholic heart, which preaches silently but eloquently to day the bitter story of bygone struggles.

We welcome you as the unrivalled pulpit orator of the Irish Church. To no other man been given in our day that matchless eloquence, "as clear as the brook's stone of Iota," which gathers round whatever poet you occupy, lends to your discourses the amazingly listen, and who retire enchanted and enlightened.

We hail you as a great and distinguished Dominican, to be for ever classed in the ranks of those chieftains whose voices thundered for Ireland's liberties, and who fearlessly faced the foe that would strike her down and wind heavy chains around her neck. May we not conceal the time when you were but you could should her wounded heart; you could have stood, as many stood on the shores of America to uphold and cheer that Irish nation which you have always loved and honored, and which has the privilege to-day of claiming you as her most brilliant son!

We ask you, dear Father Tom, to accept this address, illuminated with memorials of your trade and your country, representing and expressing, however inadequately, all that we owe you as the greatest of pulpit orators and the most distinguished of living Irishmen.

Signed, on behalf of the priests and parishioners of St. Anthony's, Liverpool, February 20th, 1881.

FATHER MURPHY.

FATHER BURKE'S REPLY.

Father Burke, on rising to reply, was cheered vehemently. He said—Mr. Chairman, rev. gentlemen, my friends, I have fort of all to return to your respected pastor, the parish priest of St. Anthony's, to the priests of this mission, and to you, the people of this parish, my most cordial thanks for this beautiful presentation with which you have honored me to-day. It seems by telling me that you are flattered and honored by my presence amongst you. No, my friends, it is I who am flattered and honored flattered, pleased, delighted—to be around me a number of my countrymen and countrywomen, banded together by religious and social bonds, which will ensure for them the elements of progress and advancement in this world, whilst they ensure and realize for them all those advantages and blessings which their fathers won for them by keeping the faith. I feel honored to be in the midst of you, for next to the approbation of my superiors in the Church, and their blessing, next to the approval of a conscience that never yet suggested to me the reality of this character, and if it is once vehemed that wigs for children are ex-officio the ruin of the soul, I do not hesitate to follow the ridiculous and pernicious fashion without a thought or a care for the come and what they may say. For the last 12 years hence that boys and girls just entering their teens are becoming liable to bald; in a thousand ways. The powerful and which she could exert for the welfare of society, and which, at the commencement of our Pontificate, we tendered to those who rule over the destiny of the people, has not, unhappily, been accepted as it should have been. Meanwhile, the people who have strongly at heart the preservation of the faith of their ancestors, and the performance of those duties which the glorious profession of Catholicity imposes on them, have long groaned under the weight of increasing trials and of the hardest privations.

With regard to Ireland, the Sacred College sings and knows by a daily experience the deplorable condition to which We have been reduced, a condition which belits neither our dignity nor the Divine mission which Our Lord entrusted to confer upon His Vicar for the good of the Universal Church. This sad spectacle profoundly grieves and afflicts Us; nevertheless, it does not in any way weaken Our hope nor diminish our courage. We know that the Church is not unaccustomed to such struggles, and that she is of a character always to resist the attacks of time and of ages. We will continue, then, to devote to her service Our strength and Our life, anxiously only to sustain her interests, to defend her honor and her rights, and to repair her losses.

Being well aware that it is to Heaven that We must look for the timely aid, without which all our efforts and fatigues would be in vain, We call to mind that at the most stormy periods and at the most critical moments the Church has always had the option of commanding public prayers and works of penitence. We have resolved, therefore, to appoint this year, for the whole of Christendom, an extraordinary Jubilee, in order that, by a multiplication of prayers, the Lord may incline more readily to mercy, and prepare for Ireland a more prosperous time.

This Jubilee, while it appears, on the one hand, as a sign of the very serious situation in which the Church is placed, will be, on the other, a source of hope and consolation, since it opens, in great abundance, for the good of Catholics, the precious treasures by which, through the Divine bounty, the Spouse of Jesus Christ, is enriched. This is an announcement which cannot fail, we are assured, to give joy and satisfaction to the Sacred College.

Yet not with standing these words, it is with pleasure that We give to each of the members to the Sacred College, to the Bishops, and to the faithful of Ireland, the apostolic benediction.

VATICAN NEWS.—The reports published by several Liberal journals, to the effect that the Holy Father is not in a state of perfect health, and are regarded as Carnival canards. Amongst audiences recently granted by his Holiness was one to Monsignor Guillemin, of the Society of Foreign Missions of Paris, Prefect Apostolic to Tong-King, China, who presented to the Holy Father with some elegant Chinese cases. He was accompanied by two young Chinese sub-deacons belonging to the Seminary of Penang, Bassora, on behalf of the Ambassadors of Austro-Hungary and of Spain went to the Vatican, accompanied by their attaches, to present to his Holiness the congratulations of their respective Sovereigns on the fortunate termination of his election and coronation. They afterwards went to joint Cardinal Jacobini, Secretary of State to the Holy See. The Ambassadors of Portugal and of France, and the representative of Brazil to the Holy See, paid a visit to the same purpose on Friday morning. On Saturday, the representatives of Bavaria, Bolivia, and adjoining States, and of Chili, presented their congratulations to his Holiness in private audience, and they afterwards paid a visit to Cardinal Jacobini. The Princes Oscar and George of Sweden visited the Holy Father on the same day, and were received in private audience, and with all the ceremonies attendant on the reception of princes. They and their suite, who had been presented to the Pontiff, on previous occasions, by the Papal Nuncio, were received with the customary formalities. Cardinal Bonnechose, Archbishop of Rouen, who had arrived in Rome the previous day, was received in special audience on Friday. A special audience was granted to the preachers appointed for Lent on the 24th.

The Holy Father addressed them in a discourse which referred to the class of preachers they should preach to the faithful during the approaching Lenten season. An address has been sent to His Holiness signed by a very large number of Italian preachers. In this, they relate that, following out the counsel he had given and he had put in practice, in order to obtain the glorious bargue of Peter in the midst of the difficulties which assail him all sides, and promising the aid of himself and his successors, he sought the Apostolic Benediction.

REPLY OF THE HOLY FATHER TO THE SACRED COLLEGE, ANNOUNCING THE JUBILEE.—The following is a translation of the reply of the Pontiff's reply to the petition of the Cardinals:

The noble sentiments and aspirations for Our happiness which you have expressed to Us in your address, on the occasion of the anniversary of our accession are, My Lord Cardinal, very agreeable to Us, and Our heart is very consolation. During the three years of Our Pontificate, which have not been passed away, the Sacred College has given Us constant proofs of its devotion, and especially of its attachment to Our person. It has also lent Us most useful and effectual aid in the difficult government of the Church, for which we rejoice to give public testimony of our lively and grateful satisfaction, being well convinced that its assiduous and intelligent support will not diminish in the future. On this account We reckon all the more because of the increased gravity of the circumstances which now demand it.

In fact, it is not without great anxiety that We enter on this new year of Our Pontificate; for as you have so justly observed, My Lord Cardinal, the fury of the wicked increasing, the sea is agitated with tempest, and new perils threaten the mystic barque of S. Peter.

Indeed, at the present hour, the Catholic Church has, in almost every part of the world, to deplore the attempts and offences against her sacred rights. Her liberty is oppressed and restrained almost everywhere; her people and military is Russia is attacked in a thousand ways. The powerful and which she could exert for the welfare of society, and which, at the commencement of our Pontificate, we tendered to those who rule over the destiny of the people, has not, unhappily, been accepted as it should have been. Meanwhile, the people who have strongly at heart the preservation of the faith of their ancestors, and the performance of those duties which the glorious profession of Catholicity imposes on them, have long groaned under the weight of increasing trials and of the hardest privations.

How Outrages are Manufactured.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MONITOR.

Dear Sir:—I suppose you are pretty well tired of exercise, well, so are we. It is not pleasant to hear somewhat about exercise, what must it be to live where it is the order of the day? Indeed, it we may judge by some of the sort accounts of our local governors, a coercion act was not necessary when a child of ten years old cap be brought before the magistrates for the stupendous crime of whistling. I must admit I felt inclined to have a hearty laugh at this new form of treason-felony, but, possibly, laughing may be treason-felony in Ireland, at all events, and I must ask my American friends to get up a telephone for me across the Atlantic so that I may laugh safely in America. But, in truth, it is no laughing matter. If ever there was a place where it is true that "man, wrapped in a little brief authority, plays such fantastic tricks before high heaven as make the angels weep," it is an happy Ireland.

The facts of the whistling business are few, simple and significant. It seems there is in Newcastle West, county Limerick, a magistrate of the name of Gore. In Ireland Law always been governed, or misgoverned, as you like to take it, by the gun and the sword, I presume this worthy gentleman thought himself especially bound to lip virtue of his name, to look after the minds and morals of the rising generation. And here I may remark that it is not a little curious that those gentlemen who are so very anxious about the state of Ireland at present, were remarkably indifferent about it when our people were dying of famine. This very great Gun is a case in point.

During the famine some lads in Newcastle West lit upon the happy idea of earning something for the pay by a concert. They called themselves, or were called the "Black Diamonds," and they really did get a good deal of money. But this great Gun did his best to prevent them from having their concert. He failed, and it is to be feared that failure did not improve his own moral condition. The summons against the child whistler, Ambrose, was thus worded: It was for having, "on the 23d of January whistled in Upper Mary Gunn." (I copy from a local paper which gives him two "ns" to his name; I hope it is not treasonfelony to have omitted one end). It is a crime of derision, and thereby intimidated home. The other magistrate, having a summons of reason, dismissed the case, and Mr. Murray Gunn remains in a state of "intimidation" in consequence of the whistling of that dreadful little boy. But there was another little boy, one, Patrick Ryan, prosecuted for whistling with derision amounting to alarm. Now, we wonder we require a Coercion Act. It is a wonder, rather, that one should be thought necessary, for if under our present rule little boys are so continually whistling, one does not see what more severe order could be enacted or required.

But I forgot the second, or, perhaps, the proper title of this last favor granted to us by our sovereign lady the Queen is a Bill for the protection of life and property. It is indeed time there should be such a bill when little Irish boys intimidate wise and learned magistrates by whistling at them. The law of the land must be enforced, and our rulers must be protected. Let me give a piece of advice to American fathers and mothers, Irish or otherwise, when their little boys are about to behave as little boys should—threaten to send them to Ireland, to be sure they will be taught to behave properly here, and not to laugh, or smile, or play, or whistle, without leave from the magistrates, or otherwise to conduct themselves "sadly," or they will be made to wear the sad-colored garments of her Majesty's prisons. I have told in my "case of Ireland" how a little boy of ten years old, for the crime of "sadly" was sent to jail and subject to hard labor for twenty days, a stone at another little boy. I think after this little boy—in America will prefer remaining there.

In the meantime, in England, where there is no coercion, the real outrages are more abundant than ever. Lady Harbison, an Irish lady who has gone to live in England for protection from imaginary dangers, has met with real danger there—all her jewels have been stolen. Her ladyship had remained in Ireland they would have been perfectly safe. In fact, there is scarcely any family of rank in England from whom large amounts of jewelry have not been stolen. There is not a week, London journal has to say about life in England, Ireland, in truth, a "protection of life and property Bill" is needed. After the Land Bill, taking at considerable length on the utter failure of detectives to discover crime in England, the writer says:

"So far as the seizure of the complicent criminals is concerned, they might just as well attempt to find the trail of a fled Indian in the Strand at Fleet street. Meanwhile, the enterprising burglar and murderer calmly pursue the tenor of his ways unchecked path. Now it is a woman and her property of pinchbeck are robbed in broad daylight; anon, we hear that a man in a lifeproofs hat has gone to enter a dwelling, that the room of a distinguished peer has been robbed, and that immediately after he left the house apparently unmistakable. At the present moment, the burglar is as much the master of the position in the most fashionable and populous suburbs of London as, a fortnight ago, Mr. Parnell in the Houses of Commons

Of a truth, this is a time above all others when we have cause to be proud of old Ireland. Under circumstances the most trying and the most tempting, Irishmen have abstained from crime; outrages of any kind are rare, so rare, that in order to make up a respectable list and to give a color of reason to a Coercion Bill, those which have been committed had to be exaggerated and multiplied. And if I dwell on those things it is not because I suppose for one moment that poor Irish readers believe the word of the absurd stories about Irish outrages. No, they know the truth; but I respect public American opinion, and for the sake of my country and of my faith I would stain every nerve and make every effort to have the truth known in America. Here is a simple specimen of how "outrages" were manufactured by your peaceful "friend" Mr. Forster, in order to deceive the world:

Poor Mr. Forster. We have all heard of the outrage, which hides its head under its wing, and then fancies because it has blinded itself that every one else is blind. Public opinion is against Ireland to-day, but, public opinion will be different some day, and then Mr. Forster and his coercion Act and outrages could have been manufactured to suppose a Coercion Act, and how, and why, a civilized nation was treated with such cruel tyranny and with such intolerable injustice. I have before me now the Government report of Irish outrages and I say the Government report, prepared purposely for the benefit of Parliament, and to show how very very wicked we are and how necessary it is for our good, kind rulers to give us the Coercion Act. Coercion! they give us the tiny bit of bread and jam that is to appease our craving in the form of a "land bill." We have "intimidated" our good and kind magistrates by whistling, and our humane and long-suffering landlords by "intimidating" their tenants, leaving out in cows about in England we have a Coercion Act. No, I have mistaken again the proper title of this remarkable Bill; it is a "Bill for the protection of life and property." What care was taken for the protection of your lives and your property which, humble as it was, was yours as much and as rightfully as that of any landlords. When in the great famine, Mr. Stewart French flung out 3,200 men and women on the shores of America to live or die, he cared not which, so that, as he since written, the estate "breathed freely." What bill was passed for the protection of the lives and properties of the three thousand five hundred souls. Do those who do such things believe in God? Alas! it remained for Bible-loving England, for England that boasts of Christianity, and its "free Bible," to do acts of which a heathen people would be utterly ashamed.

What Bill was passed last year for the protection of the lives and properties of Irish men faithful poor when they were crics, the enterprising Land Bill, Mean-derer calmly pursue the tenor of his unchecked path. Now it is a woman and her property of pinchbeck are robbed in broad daylight; anon, we hear that a man in a lifeproofs hat has gone to enter a dwelling, that the room of a distinguished peer has been robbed, and that immediately after he left the house apparently unmistakable. At the present moment, the burglar is as much the master of the position in the most fashionable and populous suburbs of London as, a fortnight ago, Mr. Parnell in the Houses of Commons and her faith! (loud applause). Need I repeat you of O'Brien, the Bishop of Emly, who, at the siege of Limerick by Ireton, was on the ramparts when even the bravest men lost courage? He was tried for his life and condemned to death, and as he was being led out to execution the venerable man turned to the executioner and said, "I call upon you, in the name of God, to meet me before the judgment-seat of God within three days, and are that time had passed away Ireton was dead." Ireland, for as a friar, a begging friar from Ireland, a Dominican, I say that I have a nobler pedigree in Ireland than the Duke of Leinster or any other nobleman (applause). When the Emancipation Act was passed the friars were persecuted. They were the only body in Catholic Ireland whose existence the emancipating law refused to acknowledge.

I STAND BEFORE YOU AS A FELON BECAUSE OF THE HABIT I WEAR, but my title deeds to stand upon Irish soil are written in martyrs' blood, and best that ever flowed in Irish veins flow in them. The address goes on—to allude to the affair in America. Well, as to that I have nothing to say. I was in America, and I was frightened out of my life. Parnell, the celebrated English historian, a very learned man, up to his eyes in the knowledge of history (laughter), comes out and attacks us in a rough-and-tumble kind of a style. Who got the better in the encounter I leave to others to say. The Americans thought that I had the best of it. If it was so, it was because Mr. Proudie had nothing to go forward but a bundle of lies, and I had nothing to do but to prove them (laughter and applause). My friends, I am most happy to receive this beautiful gift from the hands of your most respected pastor. I am all the more happy to receive it at your hands, because I believe that you are banded together, my fellow countrymen, resolved by sobriety, industry, and the exercise of your holy relig

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

Mr. S. J. McCormick is now on a canvassing and collecting tour in the interest of the Monitor. He will visit Gilroy, Hollister, Watsonville, Santa Cruz, Monterey, and intermediate points. We hope the Rev. Clergy and our friends in any section he may visit will help him in promoting the interests of this organ of their faith. During his absence Mr. McCormick will send us correspondence from the several points where Catholic affairs are of sufficient importance. We ask our subscribers in any place he may visit to be prepared to renew their subscriptions and to help add an additional name to our increasing list of Monitor readers.

Recent Rant about the "Romish Church."

If the reading world are to believe the so-called "progressive" writers of the age, the religious theory founded by Almighty God has already run its race in the world, and should be relegated to the dusty arena of obscurity. The Church of God, these presumptive writers tell us, "does not keep pace with the intelligence and progress of the age," and then they indulge in a variety of platitudes in order to show how superior these resolent and ignorant individuals are to the very God who gave us Christianity and to the Church which, through all time, has continued to teach that Christianity in every land throughout the world. This style of criticism upon Christ and His Church may well be styled the acme of infidel presumption bordering on blasphemy, and the writers, who indulge in it, are among the most dangerous, as well as the most diabolical enemies of that God who gave us a formula of faith whereby we may be happy in this world and glorious in the world to come.

We are led into this train of thought in consequence of some, rancorous remarks which Pixley makes in the last issue of his paper, and which are so notoriously false that their error will serve to make Catholics more fervent in their faith, more attached to their Church, and more practical in their devotion; hence, we call a few of the paragraphs in order to show Pixley how blind he is in his bigotedassaults upon a Church that exists, not by the will of man, but derives its eternal existence from the power of Omnipotence itself.

"Take," says Pixley, "from the Roman Churches the element of superstition, fear of the priest, and fear of purgatory, and the Catholic Church would not survive fog a century."

Pixley, however, conveniently forgets that his programme has already been more than three centuries in use, yet, the Catholic Church is as potent in influence, as vigorous in the crusade of the Cross, and as numerous in membership as it was when Luther, Calvin, Melanchton and his companions first essayed to destroy Christianity by the very means which Pixley seeks to cover with his patront.

Luther died in the belief that he had destroyed, what he styled, the "superstition" of the Catholic Church; Melanchton departed to the Hades of heretics under the illusion that respect for the ancient priesthood of the Catholic Church was annihilated forever in the world, and Calvin died with the impression that the belief in purgatory was a thing of the past. These miserable and mistaken men have been succeeded by thousands of duped and deceived disciples, yet we find the same Faith still triumphant throughout the world, the same doctrine of purgatory is yet preached, and the true ministers of God are loved and respected by two hundred million members of the Catholic Church. Pixley, therefore, is no prophet; on the contrary, his prediction is an exploded theory already, and he exhibits his intellectual virility by serving up such slop-vats to what he calls "intelligent" readers.

Again, Pixley says:

"This Romish Church business—as it is now conducted by its present authority—is a remnant of the ignorance, the superstition, and the ecclesiastical slavery of the Middle Ages."

This paragraph is mere borrowed bigotry from the pages of dead defamers of the Catholic Church. Parrot-like, Pixley can only repeat what hordes of heretics have said before him; he is forced to follow the curriculum of calumny laid down by those traducers of truth whose puny efforts to trample on the Cross of Christ has made them the enemies of enlightenment in the age in which they lived, and caused their memory to be held in abhorrence by Christians in subsequent ages. The Church has outlived this kind of slander; she stands forth today as "a city set upon a hill" where all men may behold the beacon-light of salvation which she exalts above the sinful world. The cry of "superstition, ignorance and priestcraft" have lost their terror for Catholics and carry no conviction of truth to the mind of those outside the pale of the Church of Christ.

If Pixley desires to put his second-hand splenic theory to test, he has only to look around the world and witness the daily conversions which the Church of God is making in every land, in order to be convinced of the fact that it is not only the so-called "ignorant and superstitious" which are coming rapidly under the yoke of the Cross, but, moreover, a large proportion of that class which the world calls "intelligent and enlightened" are rapidly seeking admission into the true fold of the One Shepherd, England, "the mother country," as Pixley fondly parades her, has furnished a large quota of her most eminent men as postulants before the portals of the Church of God, and, here in America, which boasts its love of "enlightenment and progress" so vaingloriously, the Church has absorbed many of the leading lights in the intellectual sphere. These men do not forsake the idols of Protestantism in order to sleep themselves in either "superstition or ignorance, on the contrary, they continuously seek the true light of salvation which reflects the intelligence, wisdom and truth of Almighty God, and, when once they find it, they cast aside the carcasses of the world, they defy the scorn of associates and they, literally, "take up the Cross" to follow the Son of God through the mazes of that Calvary which culminated in the crucifixion, and which will open heaven to all who have the holiness and the happiness to persevere to the end. Pixley's plea, therefore, regarding "superstition and ignorance" is a misnomer unworthy of further notice.

The next charge which fanatical Frank brings against the Church is thus delined:

"The Church does not keep pace with the intelligence and progress of the age. Our Christian ... It has objected to Science."

Here, again, our garrulous grumbler is sadly mistaken. The knowledge of God is intrinsic intelligence, and in this sphere of the most elevated region of human thought, Catholics are without peers. In the Church alone is found that sublimity of intellect which is sanctified by faith and which alone can elevate the mind of man from the grosser reflection of worldly objects and exalt it amidst the region rendered thrice sanctified by the visible presence of God and his host of angelic choirs in the highest heaven. True, pure, and blessed religion alone can work this miracle upon the human mind, and the "intelligence" that does not partake of this inestimable and exalting quality is of the earth, earthy.

And, if we seek for that "progress" which Pixley says the Church does not keep pace with, what do we find? Do we discover that spiritual progress, without which, man can never attain the end for which he was created? Rather, let us say, we find materialism and mammon as the Janus faced God of popular devotion. We find society rotten to the core; we find red-handed murder running rife in our streets and preaching in Protestant pulpits; we find licentiousness fastened upon our literature; we find blasphemy in every thoroughfare, perjury in our courts, and bribery in the jury room. In a word, the "progress" which Protestantism fastened upon the world is blighting every virtue in the individual, the family and society, and which will ultimately relegate those who are ensared into its meshes back to paganism.

Tete progress—the progressive path pursued by the Catholic Church—leads in a far different direction. It leads upward, not downward; it leads forward, not backward. It serves to make men better, not worse, and if the Church of God did not exist on the world-to-day, in order to guide and to guard Christianity against the "progress" we have cited, the world would become a Pandemonium, in which existence would be a curse instead of a blessing.

There is no power on earth that can stay the downward march of mankind into the mire of iniquity save the Catholic Church. Her voice is alone heard over the shirlwind of wanton vice which is raging throughout the world; her Pontiffs have saved society from shipwreck in the past, and the voice of the Vicegerent of Christ is the only one that can still the wrathful waters in the present upheaval of vice which threatens to submerge the world. Pixley, therefore, as the censurer of the Church, becomes the "devil's advocate" in defending such diabolical progress as the "enlightened" Protestantism of this age indulges in, and against which the Church of God stands as a wall of adamant against the angry storm.

But, says this critic of the Catholic Church:

"It does not keep step with the teachings of science, the demonstrations of philosophy, and the common sense of the period in which we live."

Here, again, Pixley is in perplexity. Some of the greatest scientists the world ever produced were Catholic priests or Catholic laymen. Science, like religion, to be genuine science, must be founded upon truth. Speculative theory, antagonistic to truth, is not science, because it must and does contradict itself. Darwin and Huxley and Draper may dazzle the mind and dupe the intelligence of the masses who accept untried theory against theological fact, but the Church of God never yet has frowned upon any theory based upon well-tried truth, nor will she permit the minds of her children to be led away by the ignes fatuus of false thinkers who advance their crude and anti-Christian theories in order to serve the cause of Satan under the cloak of "intellectual development."

What we have said of science is also true of philosophy. The Church gave to the world a St. Thomas, whose philosophy stands unrivalled, and the principles of which have withstood the test of time and the assaults of atheism. No mutations of the minds of Protestant philosophers can circumvent a single proposition in the philosophy of St. Thomas, which has been the rock upon which have rested all the best philosophers of subsequent ages. Protestantism, having error for its foundation, it can never create a system of philosophy which will stand the test of God given truth, no matter how much the world may applaud the men who make it. The Catholic Church is the supreme judge in all cases where science or philosophy enters the domain of religion; and whenever scientists or philosophers have based their theories upon truth, she has ever gladly accepted their contributions to the stock of human knowledge, and blessed the minds from which they emanated. Pixley may accept as gospel any husks which fall from the fulminous minds of modern "advanced thinkers, but he must not censure the Catholic Church because she refuses to rush in with the infidel mob in paying homage to every pseudonating quack who thinks he has discovered a nostrum about which Rome knows nothing. The Church moves slowly; she fights shy of new-fangled notions because she has seen them created and crushed again many times in bygone centuries, but when once she recognizes the realistic truth in some science or philosophy, then she stamps it with the seal of her approval, and the world is safe in accepting it as consonant with the truth of God.

Pixley's Profession of Faith.

Out of the mouth of the prophet Pixley himself, we have, at length, learned the original cause of the demented and debased state of mind which he manifests whenever he attempts to write about religious subjects. In the current issue of his paper he makes this candid confession:

"We had the very stanchest kind of Presbyterianism spinked into us from the earliest days of our impressible youth. Our Christian training was overcrained. We were overspanked. It has objected to Science."

Here, then, we have the origin of that bilious hatred of all things holy which the over-spanked scribe evinces nearly every week; and which has become a species of chronic complaint against the Catholic Church. A few weeks ago Hon. Zachary Montgomery, the able editor of the Family Defender, made a diagnosis of Pixley's mental aberrations, proving conclusively that he was crazy, and the present admission of Dr. Montgomery's patient establishes the fact that Dr. Montgomery is not only skilled in legal lore, but that he is far more skillful in the science of medicine than his best friends ever gave him credit for.

It is an old and a true saying that "as the twig is bent so the tree is inclined, and the application of frequent flagellations by the Biblical birch-rod of Presbyterianism so operated upon the mind of Pixley that the wrath of his youthful depravity led him to wish that

He might be a Turk, or even a Jew.

And this is the way that Shylock now cries.

Protestantism of the Presbyterian type, therefore, is responsible for this freak of nature, as well as the many other murderous crimes committed by that Servetus-burning sect. Yet, notwithstanding Pixley's profession of faith, we must have other and better evidence of his Presbyterian origin ere we accept his assertion on this point, and we ask, the now celebrated, Dr. Zach. Montgomery to make a professional examination of Pixley, and, thereby, he will undoubtedly discover the sign-mark of circumcision! Because, as our poet says:

Lately can scan by the tor-mail of Moses
The Jewish descent of a lady or lord.

He may be a Christian—a bad one, its true—But nature has stamped him a wonderful Jew.

Four Hundred Thousand Dollars.

The caption of this article represents the amount of money which Pixley says is squandered or stolen from the public school fund every year, and we want every friend of Pixley's, and everybody else, for morality, to remember the fact, and also to bear in mind that it was not "those awful Catholics" who made the charge of corruption and robbery against the men who made age that system of education which makes more sinners than saints. A month or a year hence, Pixley may deny that he ever made such a charge, hence we put the full fact on record, so that he may not do so successfully.

"There are four hundred thousand dollars more expended annually upon our public schools than there ought to be."

This enormous amount of money is annually abstracted from the pockets of the over-taxed people, many of whom receive no benefit whatever from the system of education which they are taxed to support, because they send their children to private Protestant schools or to Catholic institutions where their purity and piety are preserved, and where they are elevated above the mad materialistic spirit which permeates through the public school system of irreligious education.

It is a favorite hobby with a certain class of writers to charge the Catholics with opposition to what they call "our public schools," but we are glad to notice a growing tendency among thinking people to expose the extravagance and corruption which abounds within the public school system, controls this department of public enterprise, a department which, not only in this city and State, but, also, in nearly every portion of the Union, is made a cloak whereby to cover up an amount of corruption and vice which will appal the public whenever the press of America becomes independent enough and sufficiently honest to expose it. The whole system is based upon the wrong principle of taxing a large proportion of the people to support institutions which, in conscience, they believe to be detrimental to their religious convictions, and which compels Israelites and Christians alike to establish schools of their own, which they have to support, in addition to the heavy drain made upon them by a set of cormorants who—as Pixley says—misapply nearly half a million of dollars annually in this city alone.

The American people, as a whole, are inclined to give equal and exact justice to all classes of citizens, and, when they become thoroughly cognizant of the great wrong which this false system of taxation inflicts upon a non-rich body of taxpayers, they will place public delegates upon a more equable basis, and one more consonant with the principle of giving to the tax payer some value for the money which each annually contributes towards the public fund for popular education—as Pixley says, when alluding to the dishonesty and depravity which exists among public officials in general "the honest men who pay taxes, and who for party reasons, will not unite with other men who pay taxes, to remedy this stealing from tax payers, is an idiot."

Cardinal Manning on the Irish Land Question

At a time when the agitation in Ireland against landlordism is commanding the attention of the civilized world, when the opinions of the press and the pulpit, of philosophers and statesmen, are eagerly sought for, it may be well to give to our readers the views of Cardinal Manning on this all-absorbing Irish land question. A thorough Englishman, as he claims to be and is prejudiced in favor of Ireland, and the accusations and dignity of his high office remove all unjust suspicion of his motives. These views were given by him in a letter addressed to Earl Grey, in the year 1881, when the Irish people were crying out for justice, as they are today, and every word he wrote then, applies with equal force and pertinence to the present situation in Ireland.

"To our own hurt," he says, "we have made the English name hateful in the past, and we must bear the penalty till we have repaired the wrong." In the following passage, he slashes England for her cruel treatment of Ireland in the past:

Dd Ireland unlawfully strip itself of all its lands, forbid its trade to send cattle, potatoes and textiles, fever, and famine? Will, wipe out the entire Irish cattle trade, its textiles, and its manufactures by Acts of Parliament, and then say, "Ireland is a country of famine and suffering in England." Her inevitable keep these things from our sight, and we therefore congregate with the nation of our own superiority to children men. Ireland is a country of property without penalty, at least in the century. In the century we have lost and lost, and must should lead us to give up the illusion that our office in the civilized world is to teach the nations of Europe.

So, John Bull must come down from his high horse where he has posed so long as the great philanthropist, and take a large seat among the nations of the civilized world as the hypocritical abuser of the rights of his fellow-man. We conclude with the following forcible passage, which reads like the language of an enthusiast, such as we would expect from a Parnell, a Davitt or a Brennan, but which, coming from so high an authority as that of Cardinal Manning, carries with it conviction and prophetic warning:

"The laws of the Maker and Giver of all good gifts have so disposed that the social order should have its rise in the soil beneath our feet. Society springs from the furrow. The mother earth, on which man is born, is not only his grave, by his inheritance and his home. Outlaw a people from their occupation and the Author of those ordinances will avenge it. The direct of social economy, which, if we would seek to establish schools of their own, which they have to support, in addition to the heavy drain made upon them by a set of cormorants who—as Pixley says misapply nearly half a million of dollars annually in this city alone.

The American people, as a whole, are inclined to give equal and exact justice to all classes of citizens, and, when they become thoroughly cognizant of the great wrong which this false system of taxation inflicts upon a non-rich body of taxpayers, they will place public delegates upon a more equable basis, and one more consonant with the principle of giving to the tax payer some value for the money which each annually contributes towards the public fund for popular education—as Pixley says, when alluding to the dishonesty and depravity which exists among public officials in general "the honest men who pay taxes, and who for party reasons, will not unite with other men who pay taxes, to remedy this stealing from tax payers, is an idiot."

The Bishops and the Land League.

The extracts from the Lenten Pastorals of the Irish Bishops, published in the Monitor of last week, and the opinions of Cardinal Manning in this issue, relating to the land question in Ireland, ought to convince every one that the Catholic pastors are with the people in the present agitation. We hope these newspapers, that took their cue from certain dignitaries, sent over the wires in the landlord interest, disparaging the Irish Bishops, will now take a hint to the proper channel. It is well not to be too hasty in accepting these cablegrams as gospel truth. Their source is somewhat suspicious, and we know the landlords have spared no money in distorting public opinion, in this country, to their side. Hence, every grain of comfort they can get is magnified into a bushel and sent over for distribution.

Unfortunately for them, the trick is generally discovered before the attempt is made to swallow the morsel. That the great body of the Bishops and clergy of Ireland are in full sympathy with the Land League, no one now will attempt to deny. It is, probably, this fact that induced the English Government to try the experiment of visiting the Holy See to send a Nuncio to the Court of St. James, through whose influence it hoped to modify the wrath of the Irish clergy. Many of the English Bishops have also expressed their hearty sympathy with the struggle now going on in Ireland, and last, but not least, the Archbishop of Paris, in a recent interview, spoke of his prayers and encouragement to Charles Stewart Parnell.

Protestantism in France.

The Tablet of last week gives us the following news about the progress of the "new reformation" in France:

The work of the new reformation in France continues very hopeful. From this side of the Channel, or elsewhere, the Protestant Congress has learned the value of movements, and continues to encourage them. Mr. Bonnet, of Geneva, and the ingenuous Count de Gasparin, are the leaders of the movement. According to Paris, they have now holdings in a large half-score, numbers of master meetings, in order to prepare Protestant brethren, and to induce them to remove from the minds of the French members, the idea that Protestantism is a large half-dozen

Farm and Home.

Slowly Learning the Practice of Total Abstinence.

A drunkard who was often urged by his wife, to take the total abstinence pledge, would reply, "I'll take it after awhile. I don't like to break off all at once, I am afraid it would injure my health; the best way is to get used to a thing slowly." "But," said his wife, sorrowfully, "don't you see that drink is loading you into thousands of ways dangerous to health and life; you will fall into a ditch or a pit, and there may be nobody near to help you out." Sure enough, as he was one night returning home drunk, he fell into an old uncovered well; then he shouted for help. His patient wife comes to his rescue, saying, "Dick! I tell you that something like this would happen to you! It is lucky I was within hearing distance or you would be drowned." Then adjusting the old and long disused windlass which was lying near, she let down a rope and told him to "take hold." She worked at the windlass until she had drawn her spouse almost to the lip of the well, but then, unfortunately her grasp slipped, and down her beloved went into his cold bath again. This was repeated till he grew suspicious, and furious, and screamed, "Look here, you're doing it on purpose, I know you are." "Well, now, I am," said the woman, conscious of her opportunity. "Don't you remember having told me that it's best to get used to a thing by degrees! I am afraid that, though it might be good for your health, it might injure your morals to bring you up too suddenly." He became very angry at first, but recovering his senses by time and the frequent application of water, he reflected on the folly of his own logic, and feeling his case growing desperate, he promised to take the pledge immediately if his dear wife would draw him out. She did so; and he, faithful to his promise, immediately went to the priest, took the total abstinence pledge for life, and with health much improved, has kept it ever since.

Fattening Chickens.

It is hopeless to fatten chickens, says the Journal of Chemistry, while they are at liberty. They must be put up in a proper coop, and this, like most other apparatuses, need not be expensive. To fatten twelve fowls, a coop may be three feet long, eighteen inches high and eighteen inches deep, made entirely of bars. No partsolid, neither top, sides, nor bottom. Discretion must be used, according to the size of the chickens put up. They do not want any room, indeed, the closer they are the better, provided they can all stand up at the same time. Care must be taken to put up such as have been accustomed to be together, or they will fight. If one is quarrelsome, it is better to remove it at once, as, like other bad examples, it soon finds imitators. Diseased chickens should never be put up.

The food should be ground oats, and may either be put up in a trough, or on a flat board running along the front of the coop. It may be mixed with water or milk; the latter is the better. It should be well soaked, forming a pulp as loose as can be, provided it does not run off the board. They must be well fed three or four times a day, the first time as soon after day-break as may be possible or convenient, and then at intervals of four hours. Each meal should be as much as they can eat up clean, and no more; when they have done feeding the board should be wiped up and some gravel spread. It causes them to feed and thrive.

After two weeks of this treatment you will have good fat fowls. If, however, there are but five or six fowls to be fatted, they must not have as much room as though there were a dozen. Nothing is easier than to allow them the proper space, as it is only necessary to have two or three pieces of wood to pass between the bars and form a partition. This may also serve when fowls are up at different degrees of fatness. This requires attention, or fowls will not keep fat and healthy. As soon as the fowl is sufficiently fatted, it must be killed, otherwise it will not get fatter, but will lose flesh.

Family Fun.

A Rather Honest Man.

A flat-footed, old-fashioned Western merchant, hailing from a country store in Michigan, was buying stock in New York a few days ago, and the firm took advantage of the occasion to make inquiries concerning some of their customers around him. When they asked about Smith, of Cashville, he replied:

"Smith? yes, he's in trade yet, but he's just married a second wife, and she going through his wealth like saltpeter. He'll fail in less n six months."

"How about Jones, of your town?"

"Jones; Well Jones is pegging along after the old style, and he's bought him a bicycle and everybody says he'll go to the wall in a year."

"Brown & Son? Well, they may keep along till spring, but I doubt it. Old Brown has got so nigh-sighted that he can't tell a sheep pelt from a coon-skin, and the boy is dead stuck on a widow woman who never wears anything less than six dollar stockings."

"But Davis is doing a good trade isn't he?"

"Davis? Well, pooty fair, but he won't last. He rented the upper part of his store to a Chicago milliner, and she broke up two families and caused a preacher. Everybody knows Davis, and his sales last week only footed up a pound of sel eratus and a washboard."

"Well, "you are the only customer on t here, and of course, you are all right."

"Me! Well, I'm all right just now, but things may change. My wife belongs to three literary societies and is the big toad at Church festivals, while I've bought a 2.40 trotter and learned to play old sledge. You neednt be surprised any day this winter to hear that I've been busted from garret to cellar; so clean that creditors can't find enough dry goods to wipe a baby's nose on."

Disappointed Hopes.

A minister's life has frequent disappointments. During a great revival, a stolid, matter-of-fact farmer went into the inquiry room, and was at once taken in hand by the anxious and zealous workers. He seemed to be visibly affected by the hymn that was sung, and after prayer one or two tears were apparently discovered. When asked, "Brother do you feel any change?" he made a rapid and distinctive movement of his hand in the direction of his throat, and then settling back in the chair, with a sigh, replied, "Not a cent; that's just what I'm after."

Regulations for Lent.

The following regulations for the observance of Lent are set forth in all the churches throughout this Archdiocese on Sunday last:

All the week days of Lent, from Ash Wednesday to Easter Sunday, are fast days of precept as one meal, with the allowance of a moderate collation.

The precept of fasting implies also that of abstinence from the use of flesh meat. But by dispensation the use of flesh meat is allowed in this Diocese during Lent, except on the following days, to wit: The Wednesdays and Fridays, the Ember days, the Thursday and Saturday of Holy Week and the Eve of the Ascensation, on which days there is to be leave to use flesh meat except by dispensation from the respective pastors, which they are hereby authorized to grant in cases of necessity. All Saturdays are also days of abstinence, but not of obligation.

The permission to use lard and flesh meat at the same meal is forbidden in Lent, even on Sundays.

It should be carefully observed that according to an answer of the Sacred Congregation of the Holy Office, to the Bishops of England in 1866, and to the Bishops of Ireland in 1867, the Holy See has never consented to have introduced the use of milk, butter, and still less of cheese, at the evening collation on fast days; but owing to the peculiar condition of the faithful in this Province, the Holy See has kindly consented to tolerate it in the use of milk, butter and cheese in a small quantity, eggs, however, excepted. But permission is not bound to fast are not subject to the above restrictions.

The use of lard or other fat condiment is forbidden in Lent and other fast days during the year, except when meat is allowed, and on Good Friday eggs and all lactiferous substances are forbidden throughout the day.

Some practices at night are recommended during Lent, particularly on those days in which flesh meat is used.

Lent being a penitential time the pastors are requested to lay before the faithful the importance of Christian mortification and also the grievous obligation of complying with their Easter duty, which may be fulfilled from the first Sunday of Lent; they will frequently and earnestly impress upon their respective flocks the necessity of attending, before all other things, to the salvation of their souls, and that they will not then to the faithful discharge of their Christian duties, the only thing that can secure to the everlasting happiness of heaven. For this purpose they will hold religious exercises in the churches several times a week, accuging to what their prudence may deem expedient.

✝ JOSEPH S. ALEMANY,
Archbishop of San Francisco.

The Number Seven.

Seven is a holy number. There are seven days in the week, and the seventh is the Sabbath or day of rest. There are seven spirits before the throne of God; seven divisions in the Lord's prayer; seven age in the life of man, and we are commanded to forgive offences seventy times seven. Every seventh year was Sabbatical, and seven times seven years brought round the Jewish Jubilee.

Then we have in the seven churches of Asia, seven candlesticks; seven stars, seven trumpets; seven horns; the lamb had seven eyes; Pharaoh in his dream saw seven kine and seven ears of corn, typifying the seven years of plenty and seven years of famine, etc.

The seven churches of Asia—Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamus, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, Laodicia.

The seven spirits that stand before the Throne of God Michael, Gabriel, Lamael, Raphael, Zachariel, Arael, Oriphiel.

Seven times Christ spoke upon the cross: "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." "This day thou shalt be with Me in Paradise." "Woman, behold thy Son!" "My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me!" "I thirst." "It is consummated." "Father, into Thy hands I commend My spirit."

Nor is this confined to sacred history, and it will be interesting to enumerate some things to which this mystic number is given.

Seven bodies in alchemy: The sun is gold; the moon is silver; Mars iron; Mercury quicksilver; Saturn lead; Jupiter tin; and Venus copper.

The seven-billed city. Ancient Rome, it being built upon seven hills.

The seven mortal sins: Pride, wrath, envy, lust, gluttony, avarice and sloth.

The seven champions of Christendom: St. George for England; St. Andrew for Scotland; St. Patrick for Ireland; St. David for Wales; St. Denis for France; St. James for Spain; and St. Anthony for Italy.

The seven senses of man: According to Ecclesiastics, they are seeing, hearing, tasting, smelling, feeling, and in addition are given understanding and speech. The first five are common to all the animate creation; man alone is supposed to be raised above the brute by possessing the two latter.

The seven sleepers. According to the legend were seven noble youths of Ephesus, who fled, in the Decian persecution, to a cave in Mount Celion, the mouth of which became blocked with stones.

After two hundred and thirty years they were discovered and awoke, but died within a few days, and were taken in a large coffin to Marseilles.

Visitors are still shown in St. Vitus Church the stone coffin. It was an ancient superstition that when the sleepers turned on their sides it indicated great disasters to Christendom.

The seven wise men of Greece: Seven Greek philosophers of the sixth century, a.c.; noted for their maxims.

Bias: his maxim was, "Most men are bad."

Chilo: "Consider the end."

Cleobulus: "Avoid extreme."

Periander: "Nothing is impossible to industry."

Pittacus; "Know thy opportunity."

Solon: "Know thyself."

Thales: "Suretyship is the forerunner of ruin."

The seven wonders of the world (ancient). The pyramids of Egypt; the hanging gardens of Babylon; the tomb of Mausolus; the temple of Diana at Ephesus; the colossus at Rhodes; the statue of Jove by Phidias; the Pharos of Egypt, or the palace of Cyrus cemented with gold.

The seven wonders of the world (modern); The colosseum at Rome; the catacombs at Alexandria; the great wall of China; Stonehenge, the hanging tower of Pisa; the porcelain tower of Nankin; the mosque of St. Sophia in Constantinople.

The seven wonders of North America: Falls of Niagara; the Great Lakes; the canyons of the Colorado; Yosemite Valley; the big trees of California; Yellowstone Park; Great Salt Lake.

Our Young Folks.

A Good Character.

Character is everything to the young, as it is the surest means to success in life. It is better than the most ample fortune; it is better than the patronage of rich and powerful friends. A young man of established character, virtuous principles, of good conduct though he be poor and left to his own unaided efforts, will rarely fail to make a way for himself in the world. He may be assailed by misfortunes, he may lose his health, or fall into adverse circumstances, and so be embarrassed and oppressed, but, as a general rule, it cannot be questioned that a fair character—a character for intelligence, virtue, and worth—is the surest pledge of success in life. For many years I have been accustomed to watch with great interest, the fortunes of the young, in their progress in life; and long since I have come to the conclusion that, in so far as success in fortune, whether in the learned professions, or in the ordinary business of men, character, virtue, intelligence, and well-regulated talent and heart is of higher value than their leadership to the richest estate, than all outward advantages whatever. Such are the natural advantages, are apt to inflate with pride, to lead to improidence, or dissipation, and ever, and where this is the case it takes but a short time to squander a fortune and lose every door which leads to respectability and happiness. But character, I repeat, never fails. It makes friends and subdues enemies, creates ladders, opens the gates of opportunity, draws around its possessor patronage and sympathy, gives him a sure and easy way to wealth, to honor, and to happiness.

Two Boys of the Sierras.

One of the prominent figures in the settlement and development of Custer county—a man who is a type of western pioneer—is Carl Wolfenden. He is a big, tall, yet symmetrically German in face and speech, nervous, energetic, resolute, courteous, yet fearless, is the pioneer of the Rocky Mountains. Educated, I believe, with Schurz, in Germany, afterwards as a soldier in the German army, then an editor in Chicago and Indianapolis, a stump speaker of no mean power, he is next found disguised with civilization, taking his gun in his hand, and climbing over the peaks of the Sierras. Later, he leads a Germany colony into the beautiful West Mountain Valley. To-day he is well-to-do. A comfortable house and full table has supplied the place of the log cabin and scanty fare of days of yore. He owns mines and prospects by the score, several of which promise to make his children millionaires, or at least leave them very well off. Speaking of his children, he has two of the most remarkable boys that may be found anywhere in Colorado. Mere children, the oldest not more than 12 or 14, they are thoroughly familiar with the geology of Rosita and Silver Cliff. They would astonish an Eastern expert with their theories of climates and horn silver. Of the lay of the porphyry and the probable formation of the boulder deposits of the Rawson. They climb up and down mountains like monkeys, and can handle picks under the ground, with the skill of a Cornish miner. There is not a foot of the ground for ten miles around Rosita with which they are not familiar, and not a mining shaft which they have not visited and explored, and their opinion of a mine that they have not explored. Talk about the precocious intelligence of the boy raised in the streets of Farmer New York, it is nothing to the men tal acuteness of these lads who have been brought up on the peaks of the Sierras Denver Tribune-Tribune.

How Katie Lost Her Mind.

A comely amiable and promising girl of about seventeen is now raving madness in the insane asylum of one of our Eastern cities. How came she mad, change! Katie was only enough to give ear to the slumberings of the tempter, prompting her to have recourse to a fortune teller in order to penetrate the dark veil of the future and to anticipate the designs of Providence. The consequence was that the mischievous answers of the fortune teller, that wicked enemy of God and man, preyed so heavily on the mind of the once happy child that she is reaping the bitter fruit of her folly in the lunatic asylum. If poor Katie had been better instructed in her little catechism she would have avoided her sad misfortune, by not going to consult the agent of the devil For, indeed, whatever power fortune tellers claim to have, comes from the devil, their master. You know, dear children, that no one goes to heaven that breaks any one of the commandments of God and does it that sin. Now, your catechism asks the question "What does the first commandment forbid? Of course you all know the answer "The first commandment forbids to worship false gods or idols, or to give anything else which over the honor which belongs to God, it also forbids all false religions, all dealings with the devil, and inquiring into things to come or secret things by fortune tellers, or superstitious practices." God, in His infinite wisdom, seems to conceal from us the future joys and sorrows of this life, being a kind and loving Father, He does not ask his children to carry crosses any faster than he gives them. He says, "sufficient for the day is the evil thereof." That means that the trials and crosses of to-day are enough for today; so that if there are crosses awaiting us in the future, our good father will give us also future time and strength to bear them.—The Chimes.

Another Famine in Ireland.

Bishop MacCormack, of Achonry, writing the other day from Ballaghaderreen to a Dublin priest said: "There is real pinching poverty prevailing here. The exceptional weather has aggravated the distress already prevailing, owing to the potato failure and death of employment. It seems to me that the Lord is visiting us for our sins. The people of our British rulers in caring for the poor, bring a heavy responsibility cast upon them at the present time. They should see, and see efficaciously, and in good time, that no one perish from want of food. The relief committees have had their turn, and did their work. The Government have done to stop forward; the "supreme law" is imperative, the duty cannot be shirked nor shifted upon others, when other's don't volunteer. What a sad state for our poor country the cry of want again going up this year, 1881.

Some time ago Mr. Sorensen wrote a touching obituary of a dead baby, and captioned it, "Our First in Heaven." when the irate mother, who had laid three others beneath the prairie grass, asked him where he supposed they'd a gone!

THE PRIESTHOOD AND THE CONFESSIONAL.

Eloquent and Instructive Lecture by the Rev. Father Rooney.

On last Sunday the Rev. Father Rooney delivered the following beautiful discourse on the above subject, before a crowded congregation, in St. Francis Church, for the benefit of the Children's Day Home, Powell street, under the charge of the Sisters of the Holy Family. The nature is one that should command the attention, and be read with pleasure and profit by all our readers, and therefore we give a full synopsis of it. The text, selected by the Rev. Lecturer, was as follows:

"Whose sins you shall forgive they are forgiven them, and whose sins you shall retain, they are retained." John, 20th chap., v. 23

Confession is the very life or soul of the Catholic Church; its practice is more important, more is more necessary both to guard the innocent and to heal the wounded. For, suppose it to be entirely removed from the earth, and, at once, human society becomes foul a sink of corruption; and suppose, on the other hand, that it is well attended to by everyone, and, I know you will find the whole world bearing the appearance of Heaven. No man can, with any show of reason, deny that, wherever Confession is practised, there is virtue in all her ordinary splendor, and that wherever it is neglected, there is vice in all its ramifications and instances. However, there are men who are devoid of reflection, bereft of the happy faculty of tracing effects to their proper causes, or who, being duped by their passions or prejudices, too easily imagine an unreasonable whatever passion reproaches, and as unpermissable whatever passion commands. Let such pass above to those blind or perverse beings, that Confession is not a free thing, that it is not a human institution which we can adopt or reject at will, or according to our fancy, but that it is a matter of divine precept, and that there is a rigorous and indispensable obligation imposed on us by God to practise it, and that this obligation concerns the learned as well as the unlearned, the rich as well as the poor, the monarch as well as the subject. Three classes of people serve to thoroughly establish the divinity of Confession. First, the works of Jesus Christ, or the absolving power of the priesthood; Second, the teaching of the holy doctors of the Church, or the testimonies of the Fathers; Third, the practice of the faithful, constant and unchanging faith on this point. Third, the evident impossibility that Confession, asked over be the work of man. Certainly, Almighty God did give to His priests power to pardon in His name, repenting sinners. The words of Holy Writ mean this if they mean anything. When Jesus said to the man sick of palsy, "See be of good cheer, thy sins are forgiven thee, some of the Scribes said within themselves, this man blasphemeth." But what said our Lord to this their thought? He appeals to a test which they cannot reasonably reject—a miracle; and He said to them whether is it easier to say thy sins are forgiven thee, or to say rise up and walk? "That you may know that the Son of man hath power on earth to forgive sins," then said he to the man sick of palsy, "Rise up, take thy bed and go into the house." Matthew, chap. 9, ver. 2nd and 6th. Now, neither the Scribes nor Christ had reference, in the passages cited, to God's being able to forgive sins; in a word, there was no question of God's power in the case. The whole difficulty on the part of the Scribes was, whether man could forgive sins, or, in the chapter of Matthew referred to, our divine Lord lays claim to this power as the Son of Man." "But that you may know that the Son of Man hath power on earth to forgive sins, etc." The people who were around him, the unbiased and unsophisticated multitude, expressed themselves in a most emphatic manner on the subject; He, says the Sacred Scripture, "the multitude seeing it" the miracle which Christ appealed to as the test of His being able to forgive sins—"feared and glorified God, who had given such power to men." So, then, the people understood that God gave such power to men. Now, the question naturally arises, did the people rightly understand; Christ, did they have a wrong idea of His sacred meaning? He, our Lord and Saviour of all, ought to set them right. His conduct in the case shows most conclusively that He multitude spoke and acted under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost. In the 18th chapter of St. Matthew, verse 18 and 19, Christ says: "And I say to thee, that thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. And I will give to thee the keys of the kingdom of Heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth, it shall be bound also in Heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt loose upon earth, it shall be loosed also in Heaven." By these words Christ constituted Peter the foundation of the Church, and the Author of the divine kingdom. He and his successors, until the end of time, were empowered to admit into the divine kingdom all who would be worthy of this favor, and to exclude all who would be unworthy to enter, that is, all who persist in sin. The conferring of the keys of a place has ever been regarded as symbolical of the possession of certain rights; in the case of Peter and his successors, it means that they have all power to remove all obstacles from those who desire to reign eternally with Christ, and the authority to keep heaven closed against all who will not obey Christ.

In the 18th chap. of St. Matthew, verse 15: Our Lord says to all His Apostles: "Amen, I say unto you, whatsoever you shall bind on earth, shall be bound also in Heaven; and whatsoever you shall loose on earth, shall be loosed also in Heaven." In this text we are informed that God constitutes His Apostles His representatives, and that He will hold Himself responsible for ratifying in Heaven all that they will do on earth. In St. John, chap. 20, verses 21, 22, 23, it is said: "And He said to them again: "Peace be you. As the Father hath sent Me, so also, I send you. When He had said this, He breathed upon them, and He said to them: "Receive ye the Holy Ghost; whose sins you shall forgive they are forgiven them, and whose sins you shall retain they are retained." The text just cited can mean but one thing, that is, that God commissioned His Apostles to absolve repenting sinners, and to leave them bound by their iniquities, who refuse to obey His law. Mark well what Our Lord does to qualify His Apostles to become the instruments of His power! He breathes upon them to make them new men, just as He breathed on the clay of Adam to give him life. After breathing on them, He said: "Receive ye the Holy Ghost." What does this sentence mean? The greatest Isaia, in the 11th, range, verses 2 and 3, fully explains the meaning of this words used by Christ: "The Spirit of the Lord is the spirit of wisdom and of understanding, the spirit of counsel and of fortitude; the spirit of knowledge and of godliness, and the spirit of the fear of the Lord." From this description of the prophet, it is evident that our sublime power is conferred on the Apostles, and for a sublime purpose. By these words, "Receive ye the Holy Ghost," they are duly qualified to act in the name and with the authority of the Lord, endowed with His spirit to pardon poor repenting sinners, and to exclude from the book of pardon those who refuse to submit to His rules. It is quite evident from the texts quoted that the Man-God has conferred the double power of binding and of loosing, of pardoning and retaining sin on His priests. But this double power necessarily demands Confession on the part of the sinner. How could the Apostles and their successors know when to bind if the people were not obliged to confess to them? From the words of Christ, "Whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven them, etc.," flows different and logically the necessity of confessing our sins. A striking comparison will elucidate this point, and will more substantiate my thesis that Confession is a divine obligation. A king cannot in person administer justice to his numerous subjects; he calls around him the most enlightened and the best upright of his subjects, and he says to them: "Go and render justice in my name; and in my place, to my subjects." Now, though, he does not say, interrogate the parties that are quarrelling, hear the accused, listen carefully to the witnesses, take care that you do not condemn the innocent or acquit the guilty, is not all this perfectly understood and implied in the commission given to them? So, in like manner, though Our Lord does not say to His Apostles: Go hear the Confessions of the people, but "whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven them," etc., the obligation of Confession is perfectly implied in the commission given to the Apostles. The duty of the Apostles is blind or lame, and of the people to confess their sins to them are correlative. Furthermore, we must bear in mind that the priest, as minister of the power of the keys, holds a judge relation to the sinners. He is judge, doctor of the law, and physician. The absolving power, itself, necessitated as it is constituted judge by God to decide between Him and His people. He is doctor of the law by the very nature of his priestly office. He is the guide of the people; he is the director of their souls, and they must be led with the word from his lips, "Teach all nations;" "Teach the people to every creature," are the words of His patents. For the tips of the priest shall keep knowledge, and they shall seek the law at his mouth. "because he is the messenger of the Lord of Hosts," says the prophet Malachy, 2nd chap., verse 7. He is appointed to the office of the soul to cure her; to administer spiritual medicine to her. He is doctor of the law by the very nature of his priestly office. He is the guide of the people; he is the director of their souls, and they must be fed

Poetry.

THE ANNUNCIATION.

BY W. D. KELLY.

Hail! full of grace, I picture thee at prayer,
Under the cedars of thy peaceful dwelling,
As Gabriel, the angel, found thee there,
What time, thy motherhood to thee foretelling,
He stood within the cloister where thou knelt,
With thy pure senses wrapt in holy adoration,
And, knowing all the graces with thee dwelt,
Addressed thee in this strain of salutation.

And oh, Madonna, angel never saw
Such wondrous beauty in corporeal creature
As the archangel, who looked down in awe
Upon the splendor of thy flawless features:
As with thy tresses balding a fair
Purer than ever nature gave another,
Thou bent before him in thy cellish grace,
And heard his lips proclaiming thee a mother.

In those days of Israelitic thrall
No Jewish maiden was a happier dreamer
Than she who thought herself preferred of all
To bear her land its hereditary redeemer;
Virginity had no charms for woman when
With Roman fetters were their limbs encumbered,
And she was blessed among matrons then
Whose sons her sister's prowess outnumbered.

But thy humility had never dared
To picture for itself crowning vistas;
By day or night thy bosom never shared
The ecstacies that thrilled thy Jewish sisters:
For thee was chastity a bridal dress,
For thee thy Maker seemed alike and lover;
To hound His temple was thy happiness,
Answer His altar thy delight to hover.

But, lo! one morning in that long age,
Came Gabriel, the chosen one of angels,
On his white pinions, to the world below,
Bearing the secret of divine vengeance.
Ah! Jewish matrons, each of whom had prayed
That you might be the King's depositary,
The angel's flight, Nazareth was stayed
Above the humble cot in the Virgin Mary.

Hail! full of grace, I picture thee at prayer,
In all the glory that thy meekness won thee,
As Gabriel, the angel, left thee there
With thy young motherhood still new upon thee
In those first moments when, with fears allayed
That filled thy bosom with a sudden tremor,
Thou recognized, myself, unspotted maid,
To the mother of the world's Redeemer.

Literary Miscellany.

The Pilot's Story.

We had grown up together, as it were, Mollie and I, our parents being near neighbors, and—which does not always follow—fast friends as well. They were poor, and I suspect that fact had much to do with their friendship, for opportunities were always turning up for helping one another, and I have often noticed that, when near neighbors are well off and have no need for mutual help there is very seldom any friendship between them: there is more apt to be jealousy and competition.

Our parents being such good friends, it naturally resulted that Mollie and I followed their example. We went to school together, read together, played together, and, somehow, when Mollie was eighteen and I was twenty, we agreed to travel together all our lives, and were very happy in that arrangement; in fact, no other would have seemed right or natural, either to us or our parents.

From the earliest days of my boyhood, I had a fondness for the water, haunting the palatial steamboats that floated on the great Mississippi river, on whose banks nestled the city in which we dwelt, and, at the period to which I am about to refer, I had just secured a position as pilot on a small freight steamer.

It was not much of a position, to be sure, as we then much of a salary attached to it, but, small as it was, Mollie and I decided that we could make it answer for two people, neither of them extravagant or unreasonable; besides which, I had hopes of better times to come, as I had received words of commendation from my employers, and promises of speedy promotion.

So, early one bright morning, having obtained a day's leave of absence, Mollie and I were married, and stepping into a carriage I had hired for the occasion, we started off, having decided on a day's excursion to a celebrated cave near by, this being all the wedding trip we could allow ourselves, for that we cared in the least, however: we were too happy to be in the least disturbed by any shortcomings of sum or purse.

We had scarcely driven beyond our own street when we were brought to a halt. A messenger, whom I recognized as belonging to our steamboat company hailed me.

"Here's a note to you from the superintendent."

Thus it ran:

"Am sorry to have to recall your leave for to-day, but you must immediately go on board the Mobilia, which is ready to start up the river. The pilot is too ill to attempt to duty, and you are appointed to take his place for the present."

"There goes our wedding trip all to smash," said I as I—like read the order.

"Why so?" she asked.

"You see I must go into the pilot-house of the Mobilia."

"Very well," she replied. "We shall just go up the river instead of to the cave. Drive on, Rob; let us go down to the wharf in state."

"But you can't go in the pilot-house with me, little grace."

"Of course, not; but I can sit on the deck outside," laughed Mollie, "and we can cast burnishing glances at each other."

And so it came to pass that I took possession of the Mobilia's pilot-house, my heart glowing with love and pride; with love, for there, just below me, on the little forward deck, sat my sweet bride; with pride, because the Mobilia was one of the finest of the beautiful floating palaces of the Mississippi, and to pilot such a one had for years been the height of my ambition.

The steamer was fitted up with a double cabin, one above the other; the upper one opening upon a small deck, reaching out towards the boy, near the center of which, on a raised platform, was placed the pilot-house. This deck was always occupied by passengers, and this morning it was particularly crowded, for the boat was heavily laden with people taking advantage of the beautiful weather to make an excursion up the river.

Some rough fellows jostled against Mollie's chair after a while, and she rose and passed down into the lower cabin, "to get a drink of water," she whispered to me as she passed; but I suspect it was to prevent the bursting of the thunder-cloud she saw gathering on my brow.

I saw that the insolent fellows made no attempt to follow my dear one; so I gave myself up to my own happy thoughts, and looking over on the far-distant, peaceful shores of the great river, over whose placid bosom we were moving so swiftly, there arose from my heart a glad silent hymn of rejoicing.

But suddenly a cry broke from the cabin behind me that effectually changed the current of my thoughts.

"Fire! fire! fire!" A horrible cry at all times, but most horrible of all when it rings forth in the midst of gay, unsuspicious hundreds floating in fancied security in the midst of the waters.

An instant's awe-struck silence succeeded that awful cry, and then 300 voices of men, women and children rose in fearful, heartrending shrieks for help.

"Fire! fire! fire!"

Aye! there was no mistake about it, nor false alarm. No one could tell how it had commenced, but there it was creeping along the roof of the upper cabin, with its deadly flames greedily lapping up every scrap of awning and curtain they could find upon their way, ever and anon darting long tongues of flame down to the floor to clasp the light chairs and tables and settees in their fiery embrace.

As well seek with a sieve to scoop up the waters of the great river on which the Mobilia floated, as to try to subdue the roaring, devouring enemy that had seized upon the ill-fated steamer.

The people darted down from the blazing upper cabin to the forward deck below, there, as yet, the fire had made but little headway, and there our brave captain—who was that even now "the right man in the right place"—succeeded in partially quelling the panic.

"Keep quiet!" he ordered—"keep quiet, and stay just where you are, or I will not answer for the lives of any of you! The steward will provide every one of you with life preservers; but there is no reason for any present to go overboard—not yet awhile, at any rate, unless suicide is desired. Keep quiet, I say! Pilot, head her straight for the land, half a mile ahead!" (We were at least twice that distance from the mainland on either shore.) "Engineer, put on steam—crowd her on!" We did run a race with the foul fiend who has boarded the Mobilia.

There was an instant's pause, and then, with a groan and a surge, with the timbers creaking, and straining, and the windows rattling, and as though in mortal terror, the Mobilia gathered herself up to run her last race.

Each passing moment the flames crept on and on, never pausing in their terrible march. Fortunately, they leaped upward rather than downward, so that there was as yet but little danger to the panic-stricken crowd on the lower deck.

But the pilot-house was directly in the track of the flames and already their advance guard was beginning to surround me, singeing my hair and eyebrows.

Doubtless there was a murmur among the people below and the next instant a light form flew up the ladder leading to the pilot deck by the pilot house, and before I could say a word, my precious Mollie had thrown open the door, and, closing it again, stood at my side.

"Mollie, Mollie!" I cried. "For heaven's sake go back, go back! Don't you see how the flames are creeping towards us here! Go, go, my dearest, my own true wife! Don't unman me by making me fear for you. Go down where I can feel that you have a chance for safety."

"Rob Thorpe," she exclaimed, with her eyes looking straight into mine, "Am I your wife?"

"Surely, surely, thank God!" I muttered.

"But, go, go!"

"My place is here, just as much as yours is," she answered firmly. "I will stay here, Rob, and if you die, I will die, too. We made our wedding vows together, my dear husband, even if it be into the next world. Keep to your duty, and never mind me, Rob.—There is hope for us yet, and if it comes to the worst, why!"—and a grave, sweet smile crept round her lips—"we are still together, dear Rob."

"I saw it was no use to urge her any more, for emotion threatened to choke my throat, so that I could not utter a word, so I just gripped the wheel hard and looked right ahead, though everything looked very dim just then, and my devoted darling stood calmly at my side, watching the flames that were creeping closer and closer upon us, leaping around the pilot-house like hungry demons impatient for their prey.

"Thorpe," shouted the captain, "come down. Lower her and yourself over the rail. We'll catch you. You cannot stay there any longer. We are very near the shore now, and the rest we'll take our chances on."

It was an awful temptation. I knew that, did I follow the captain's advice, both Mollie and I would be safe, for I was a good swimmer, and should the boat not reach the shore, I could save her and myself; but then if I did that, we would deliberately expose every one of the three hundred souls on board to a destructive. True, the boat might keep so near the shore during the short space remaining to be passed merely from the impetus of her approach, but again she might not—and then—

I looked at my dear wife inquiringly. "Stick to your post, Rob!" she said.

"No, sir!" I shouted back. "I shall stick to my post; I shall stay here till I run her down on the shore or sink!"

"My brave Rob—my noble Rob!" murmured Mollie.

But she for my devoted Mollie! alas for me! Not the pilot-house only but the entire deck around it was now surrounded by the flames. It was too late to lower ourselves to the deck below! The railing was all ablaze.

My arms, released from their guardian ship over the wheel, clasped Mollie close to my heart; but my eyes and brain were busy seeking for some mode of escape from death that seemed each instant more certain.

All at once my eyes rested on the paddle-box. It had not taken fire yet; the flying spray had saved it. I had only to dash down the flame-swept deck and fling open a little door in its side, which afforded ready access to the wheel, to lower my precious charge to the water beneath in safety. No sooner thought of than done.

"Take my hand, Mollie," I said, "and run with me. We shall be saved, after all. Wrap your shawl across your mouth. Now, now—run!"

Leaping down on the deck, we sped, hand in hand, to the paddle-box. I dashed open the little door, and pushing Mollie inside, passed in myself, and drew the door close again, shutting out the eager flame whose angry roar pursued us as we dropped gently down into the shallow water and crept from beneath the wheel.

But appearances are deceitful with a shoot of delight and relief, for all had given us up as lost; and we must have been but for the boats longest frightful for your money, and then, having methodically unfolded the bill, and put on your eye-glasses to ascertain its denomination, you may slowly place it in the top of the box. These three rules, we believe, will be sufficient for all ordinary purposes. N. B.—A button should always be placed in a blank envelope.—Boston Courier.

Evidently, in Boston, every church-goer puts something, even a segar stump or a toothpick, in the box. In San Francisco the case is different. The large majority of our people are so wrapt up in their devotions that nothing less than the yell of a Comanche Indian will arouse them from their ecstacy about the time the box is passed around. As we have not a stock of Comanche to yell, the box is passed in vain. We propose to add a rule or two, in addition to the above, for the benefit of home institutions.

1st. When the collector approaches with just the faintest inclination to a blush, miss the place in your prayer-book, and scrupulously occupy yourself in finding it out.

2d. If you haven't a prayer-book, roll your eyes into space, opposite to the collector, and recite Paradise Lost. It doesn't make much difference what prayers, as they don't amount to anything, anyhow.)

3d. If you are passingly acquainted with the collector, pay no attention; but if the box is held rigidly before you, stare at him like a Spanish bull, and feeling that he has offended you, he will bow and pass on.

4th. If in the next pew are two or three neighbors who might think you mean if you did not do your duty, simply beckon the collector, and whisper in his ear that the sexton should close the windows as there is too much draft. The collector will nod his head in acknowledgement, and the three neighbors will, of course, imagine that you notified him to call around next day for a check of fifty dollars.

Godfrey de Bouillon.

Godfrey of Bouillon was the hero of the first crusade. It was the dream of his early boyhood that he would one day march with an army to liberate Jerusalem, and redeem the sepulchre of Christ. So soon as the Crusade began he sold his lands for the benefit of the enterprise, and set out for the Holy Land at the head of 70,000 foot and 10,000 horse. This force had dwindled to 20,000 when he reached Jerusalem. After a vigorous siege of forty days a successful assault was made, and, says Gibbon, the historian, "On Friday, at three in the afternoon, the day and hour of the Passion, Godfrey of Bouillon stood attentious on the walls of Jerusalem." Godfrey was chosen and hailed king of the Christian kingdom of Jerusalem, but he showed true humility by refusing to wear a golden diadem, or be called king, in a city where the Saviour had been crowned with thorns, and he desired to be called only Defender and Baron of the Holy Sepulcure. Godfrey died within a year aft. his accession.

COPERNICUS.

A Catholic Priest Prince of Astronomers.

When the distinguished visitor to our shores, Proctor, appeared before a Tasmanian audience as a lecturer on the sublime science of astronomy, says the Tasmania Catholic Standard, one of the first authorities he referred to, and one of the first names he mentioned, was that of a man who in his time said Mass, heard confessions, and read his breviary daily (and yet who in the Town Hall of Hobart, were aware of that fact on that occasion! How many have heard the words of "the Copernican system," and yet how few have been informed that it has received its name from a Catholic priest, the Very Rev. Canon Copernicus! How few of the youth of the present day, who receive their education in Government or Protestant schools, are ever made aware of the fact that the system now universally adopted throughout the civilized world as the best solution of the various phenomena of the heavenly bodies, had for its author a man of the "Roman Catholic Church!" But this is quite a usual suppressio veri, to which non-Catholics seem ever ready to be a party, when there is question of anything that would redound to the glory of God's Church.

Copernicus was born in Polish Prussia in 1473, and died in 1543, aged seventy years. He studied for the medical profession in the University of Cracow, where he took his diploma as M.D. Most great scientists of every age have, at some time of life, directed their minds and footsteps to Rome, the fons sapiendi; so did Copernicus. He studied for a few years in the University of Bologna, where his ability soon won for him a name. His fame reached the Eternal City, where he was invited to come and accept a professor's chair in one of the chief seats of learning; he did so, and was received with paternal kindness by Paul III. Ptolemy's system, which placed the earth in the centre, with the sun and planets revolving round it, was almost universally adopted up to that time. True, Pythagoras and Hypparchus had long before taught that the sun was a centre of our system, but they had not many followers.

It is said that, as far back as A.D. 470, Martianus Capella at Rome taught that Venus and Mars revolved round the sun; and in 1460, Cardinal De Cusa wrote a book entitled, "De docta Ignorantia," or "Learned Ignorance," in which he held the same theory. Copernicus became acquainted with their views, and made many observations, and studied the question carefully himself for over twenty years; at length he was convinced that the sun was the centre of our system, and that the earth and other planets revolve round it. He wrote a book on the subject called "De Revolutionibus Orbium Coelestium," in which he proved his theory, and dedicated it to his friend and patron, Pope Paul III. The Holy Father advised him to take Orders; he did so, was ordained Priest, and then went forth on his mission to Germany with gifts and blessings from the benevolent Pontiff. He was appointed by his uncle, the Bishop of Ermeland, to the Canonry of Frauenburg, where he led a most holy and studious life.

He erected an observatory in the tower of his church, and spent much of his time there observing the planets, stars, and the different phases of the sun and moon. It is said he divided the twenty-four hours of each day into three parts, eight hours he gave to sleep and to meals; eight to study, and the remaining eight to his priestly duties, saying Mass, visiting the poor and the sick, dispensing food and medicine to them as well as spiritual gifts.

When about seventy years of age, he had re-written his book and sent it to the press for publication; he stated that for full twenty years he had laboured at work by his side, comparing each successive observation with those already made; correcting what he believed to be erroneous, and convincing his mind still more as years rolled on of the truth of the great fact that the sun was the ruling orb occupied the centre of our system. His last hour came, and on his death-bed he had a double consolation—that which religion imparts to her departing children, and that which comes to one when he sees the labors and anxiety and battles of a long life crowned with victory. A copy of the new work was placed in the hands of the dying priest; he turned over a few leaves of that book which was to associate his name forever with the sublime science of the heavens, and to secure for him a fame enduring as the world itself; he expressed his satisfaction and calmly expired. Pope Paul III. paid a portion of the expense of printing the book, and thus he who was the friend and patron of Copernicus in life, was his benefactor in death.

Republics a Success.

This significant remark is made by the London Echo: "While Italy is accumulating a deficit; while Australia is bending under a deficit; While Spain can scarcely make both ends meet, and while the alleged improvement of the financial condition of Prussia had provided to be illusory—to say nothing of Russia—it is worthy of notice that Switzerland, as she has done for ages, maintains in government matters the even tenor of her way; that France, under the republic, feels no financial strain, and that the United States, the greatest republic of all, is going forward to prosperity by leaps and bounds." This would indicate that Republican institutions are a striking success from a business point of view, on both sides of the ocean.

THE PERPETUAL OBLATION.

From the Rising of the Sun to the Going Down Thereof.

Have our young catholics ever thought that the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass is being offered in some part of the world every hour of their lives? When it is midnight in New York, Mass is beginning in the churches of Italy. There ancient altars, at which saints have knelt, are lit up with tapers, and the Vicar of Christ and thousands of priests are lifting lofty hands to heaven. Think of the hundreds of quiet chapels—

Jesus thou
And Mary's image meek and fair,
And the dim light, with rich and pure,
Scattered round the chapel floor,
While the tinkling beads they tell,
Is whispers scarcely audible.

A little later and the bells of a thousand towers in France begin to sprinkle the air with holy sounds, and in every city, town and hamlet, kneeling crowds adore the chastening hand of God, and pray for sinners who despise His ordinances.

Chivalric and religious Spain catches the echoes, and, when it is one o'clock in New York, offers the great Sacrifice in countless splendid churches.

And then Catholic Ireland, the Island of Saints, which has, during the many centuries, suffered for the Faith, rallies anew around the altars of her ancient forsaker.

At two o'clock and after, the priests of the islands of the Atlantic—perhaps the Cape Verde—white-robed and stoled, and wearing the great cross on their shoulders, bend before the tabernacle.

An hour later, a courageous missionary lifts up the chalice of salvation on the redwood coast of Greenland.

At half-past four the sacred lamps are lighted through the Cage of Newfoundland, and at five, Nova Scotia's industrious population begins the day by attending Mass.

And now all the Canadian churches and chapels grow radiant, as the faithful people—the habitant of the country, the devout citizen, the consecrated nun, and the innocent hasten to unite their prayers around the sanctuary where the priest is awaiting them.

At six how many souls are flocking to the churches of New York, eager to begin the day of labor with the holiest act of religion! Many young people, too, gather round the altar there at a late hour, like the fresh flowers which open with the morning and offer their dewy fragrance to heaven.

An hour later the bells of Missouri and Louisiana are ringing, and at sight, Mexico, true to the Faith, bends before its glittering altars.

At nine, the devout tribes of Oregon follow their loved blackgown to their gay chapels, and California while loosens its grasp on its gold, to think of the treasure that rust doth not corrupt.

And when the Angelus bell is ringing at noon in New York, the unbloody sacrifice is being offered on Calvary, and in 1872 Sarah Flora Hastings, daughter of Lord Donnington and the Countess of London, and the nuptials were blessed in 1870 by the north of the Earl of Arundel and Surrey. The story now goes—and, indeed, I may say that it is much more than a mere story—that the unfortunate parents have strong reason for the horrible and distressing suspicion that the baby is quite blind. If this should, unfortunately, turn out to be a correct forecast, the most painful circumstance will affect large numbers of the greater nobility, both of the old and the new faths, for the Howards are allied in all directions where blue blood is in the ascendant. Another thing, the unfortunate child must, in the ordinary course of nature succeed as his father's heir to all the titles, privileges, estates and duties of the present duke. How those multifarious functions could be performed adequately by one who is blind, will be a sad and weary problem for future elucidation. For one instance of many, the head of "all the Howards" (as Byron hath it) is Premier Duke and Earl, Hereditary Earl-Marshal of England, and in that high and mighty capacity alone has duties to perform on occasion of great court ceremonies—as the coronation of the Sovereign, for example—which it would be almost impossible for one afflicted with blindness to undertake. However, let me, speaking for a wide range of people, express the earnest wish that the suspected blindness may after all, not prove to be permanent. Now-days oculists, especially those of Germany, are so clever that really they sometimes effect cures not far removed from miracles. Perhaps, if a fund could be raised to do the people, or counselled by the leaders, and such a course would meet with his emphatic disapproval. The present membership of the Land League in the United States is not by any means confined to Irishmen or Irish-Americans. All classes and nationalities are included in the ranks, and, as a result, loyalty to a common cause has made some strange bed-fellows. The Land League branches include quite a number of Orangemen. Political sentiment, Catholics and Protestants, rich and poor, unite in a common expression of sympathy and encouragement to Ireland. The Land League is numerically strongest In the South and Great West, the organization is yet in its infancy, although there is an active branch on the Pacific coast. There are no State or other subdivisions, each branch, however small, communicating directly with the national headquarters in the city. At the great demonstration in Faneuil Hall—Boston's "cradle of liberty"—last week, General H. F. Butler, now the Democratic leader in Massachusetts, created tremendous enthusiasm among the ten thousand auditors by declaring—"I am tired of sending money to Massachusetts people; but I am willing to send aid to Ireland for the purpose of recovering for her her liberties. If England's attempts to maintain her position, there is but one end, and when that end shall come, or the beginning of that end, count me in, fellow-citizens, on Ireland's side every time." Such words as these show the quality of the rising tide of popular feeling in America on the whole Irish question.

The Pope Through Protestant Eyes.

The Liverpool Catholic Times has cause to believe that "Protestants have now pretty nearly abandoned the belief that horns grow out of the head of the Pope, or that he has a human baby for his dinner every Friday, while the rest of the Catholic world confines itself to fish—as was gravely stated and believed in parts of Scotland not so very long ago; but there is still a floating opinion that his Holiness is a very terrific personage indeed, into whose presence a heretic can only go with fear and trembling. An American Protestant lady, who recently visited the Vatican in this spirit, and who was astonished to find that the successor of two hundred and fifty-seven Pontiffs conducted himself like any other Italian gentleman, records some of her sentiments in the columns of the Chicago Times. "I kissed the large amethyst of the Pope's ring," she says, "and looked up into his kindly eyes. His robe was of white cashmere, a gold chain hung round his neck, and on his head was a white skull cap fringed by his silvery hair. A lady of the Imperial city acted as interpreter to the fair American, and as the Pope laid his hand on the head of the visitor, he turned to her introducer and said, 'An American; and how, then, did you come to know her?' 'Holy Father, she lives in my house,' was the reply. 'She is good,' added his Holiness, with a merry smile in his eyes; 'and,' remarks the lady correspondent of the Chicago Journal, 'not wishing to rest under false pretences, said that I was a heretic, I am a Protestant,' whereupon he made a little wry face, laughed, shook his head at me, and laid his hand in blessing on my head a second time.

"The lady's experiences at the Vatican," continues our exchange, "reminds us of a visit paid to the late Pope by another Protestant lady, who was a celebrated writer—Frederica Bremer: 'I love our Lord,' she said to Pius IX., 'with my whole heart; I believe in His Divinity, in the efficacy of His Redemption. Will your Holiness acknowledge me as a Christian?' 'Most certainly,' replied the Pope. 'And as a member of the Church of Christ' pursued the visitor. 'Yes, in a certain sense,' replied the Pontiff; 'you must not believe that we deny salvation to all who do not acknowledge the infallibility of the Catholic Church. No, I believe that many persons of other creeds may be saved by living according to the truth which they acknowledge. I most certainly believe so.' Whereat the author of 'Twelve Months in Daughters,' and 'The Neighbors' went away vastly delighted."

Reported Blindness of the Duke of Norfolk's Son.

Society says a very painful rumor is just now being whispered about in connection with the son and heir of the Duke of Norfolk. The Duke married in 1867 to Lady Flora Hastings, daughter of Lord Donnington and the Countess of London, and the nuptials were blessed in 1870 by the north of the Earl of Arundel and Surrey. The story now goes—and, indeed, I may say that it is much more than a mere story—that the unfortunate parents have strong reason for the horrible and distressing suspicion that the baby is quite blind. If this should, unfortunately, turn out to be a correct forecast, the most painful circumstance will affect large numbers of the greater nobility, both of the old and the new faths, for the Howards are allied in all directions where blue blood is in the ascendant. — ON THE —

LAND LEAGUE IN AMERICA.

— AND ITS —

President, General P. A. Collins.

When it is considered that there are more Irishmen in American than in Ireland, and that sturdy, whole-souled loyalty to the mother-country is one of the strongest traits of Irish-American character, the marvellous growth during the past few weeks of the auxiliary Land League movement on this side of the water is in some measure accounted for. In an interview to-day with the President and Secretary of the Irish National Land League of the United States, I was informed that at the time of Michael Davitt's arrest the branches in cities and towns of this country numbered fully 300,000 members. Within the past two weeks this total has been swelled by thousands daily, and it is no exaggeration to estimate that by the time this reaches you there will be fully half a million names enrolled on the books of the organization. But it cannot be claimed that America is in full sympathy with the Irish leaders. That the weight of public opinion is overwhelmingly anti-English, no candid observer in this country will deny. Even the ultra Conservative press admits that Ireland suffers from a radically wrong and unjust system, which England, sooner or later, must abolish; and the sentiment of regret out in the universal condemnation of the course of the English Government in dealing with the Byers. This popular indignation is traceable to the bad work of Parnell and Davitt before their return, and later to James Redpath's ringing declarations upon the lecture platforms of the country, that there is more sinless sorrow in Ireland than elsewhere on the face of the earth. The events of the last few weeks have magnified and intensified this feeling until it fires the American heart with much of the spirit of revolutionary times. When America's heart is touched, her purse-strings are loosened, at the same instant. Hence, General Collin's claim that the names enrolled in the Land League of America represent two pounds each at the first appeal is no empty boast. The amount of treasure which Ireland's friends in America would pour out for her aid can scarcely be estimated. "The organism of the American branch of the Land League is not yet properly systematized. Since the Buffalo Convention, the work of organization has been pushed vigorously forward, and soon every detail will be properly arranged. The movement is being conducted by a committee, of which General P. A. Collins, the President, is a man of great executive ability, and an energetic persistent worker. He is a gentleman, about forty years old, of commanding presence, and his keen, fiery eye, grip, magnetic voice, and impressive gesture give an added charm to his bold, forcible oratory. He is a prominent lawyer in this city, a leader in Democratic circles, and at the last election ran ahead of his ticket as candidate for Attorney-General. In his first formal public address since his acceptance of the presidency of the League, he outlined the work which the American auxiliaries to be to furnish moral and financial aid to the National Land League in Ireland, in its efforts to obtain such changes in the land laws as will make those who cultivate the soil of Ireland prosperous. The main tains the entire independence of the American organization from all dictation or direction of the Irish leaders at home or in England, and, on the other hand, he will refrain even from giving advice to the parent League. The plea that the landlords possess the land, by right of ownership or contract, is met by General Collin's rather sweeping declaration that "they have been false to their trusts, false to the Irish people, and false to the sanctity of contract between the shark and the sailor, the wolf and the lamb." He further believes that Mr. Parnell and the other Irish leaders are fully trustworthy, and he is very indignant at the denunciation of newspaper and other public criticism of their acts. Every dollar that's needed or asked for is being sent to Ireland, wherever it will do the most good, said President Collins confidently asserts that three millions could be sent across the water within three weeks if called for. He has no fear that force of arms or other extreme measures will be resorted to by the people, or counselled by the leaders, and such a course would meet with his emphatic disapproval. The present membership of the Land League in the United States is not by any means confined to Irishmen or Irish-Americans. All classes and nationalities are included in the ranks, and, as a result, loyalty to a common cause has made some strange bed-fellows. The Land League branches include quite a number of Orangemen. A LAND LEAGUE COURT ON TRIAL.

Clare Assizes—Crown Court.

ENNIS, Thursday Night.

Judge Fitzgerald entered court at ten o'clock to-day, shortly after which the prosecution against a number of Land Leaguers for holding an illegal court, at Miltown Malbay was proceeded with. The prisoners were—James Clancy, president; John O'Brien, secretary; James Daly, Michael Holohkn, James Finnesne, James Flanagan, Patrick MacMahon, and Thomas Hehir. They were charged with unlawfully and seditiously contriving to bring into disrepute and to diminish the confidence of her Majesty's subjects in the tribunals duly and lawfully constituted, by inducing people to frequent other courts; and further, with seditiously attempting to usurp the prerogatives of the Crown.

Sergeant Heron and Messrs Raymond and Lynch represented the Crown, and Messrs Roche and Moriarty (instructed by Mr. Kelly, Kilrush), defended the accused.

Four or five witnesses were examined on behalf of the Crown. Their evidence was to the effect that they received notifications from the secretary of the league to attend before the league with a view to explaining some charges which had been made against them, regarding farms which they had got possession of. They attended at the league, not through dread, and were told they were not bound to submit to the decisions of the league, and that their action should be voluntary, which they understood meant an offer of the league regretted they had not swords and buckshot to enforce the decisions. Another witness said he was threatened with the vengeance of the Dublin Land League if he did not comply with the ruling of the body.

In reply to the learned judge, the witnesses stated that they were not sworn, and there were no clerks of courts. The jury acquitted two of the accused, Hehir and Flanagan. They, disagreed with regard to the other prisoners, and they were discharged. The prisoners were discharged on their own recognizances to appear at the next assizes to stand their trial.

Judge Fitzgerald said that as the accused had acted apparently in ignorance of the law, and it having been now explained to them that the holding of such courts was illegal, he would recommend the Crown not to repeat the prosecutions if the parties abandoned the holding of such illegal courts.

Sergeant Heron said his lordship's observations would be attended to.

Owing to the prisoners' challenges being exhausted the crown were enabled to place on the jury twelve Protestants.

Patrick O'Halloran, charged with pointing threatening notices at Tulla, was tried before Judge Barry and acquitted.

A letter carrier, named Earls, was sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment for stealing two shillings in postage stamps from a letter.

Martin O'Neill, the landlord of Ballinahinch, his father-in-law, Matthew Dwyer, was sentenced to twelvemonths' imprisonment.

That concluded the business of the assizes.

Mr. Bence Jone's Laborers.

The decrees for the possession of the houses of Mr. Bence-Jones's laborers, who left his employment last December, obtained at the Tuudgaune Petty Sessions, were on Thursday carried into execution. The police had a considerable attendance from surrounding stations, including Inspector Mills and Head-Constable Horgan, Clonakilty. There was no demonstration, and the proceedings passed off quietly. A party of marines under command of Lieut. Hyron with 20 men on patrol in the vicinity. At 12 o'clock six policemen, accompanied by Messrs Lawe, Browne and Stanley, who were deputed by Mr. Bence Jones to get possession, started from the barracks at Ballinascarthy, and proceeded to the house of John Brien. This poor man had all his little furniture removed in the yard. When they arrived, the police and bailiffs proceeded to see that all was out, the door was then locked, and the key given to Mr. Stanley. Brien has a wife and five children, he removed to Clonakilty, where it is stated he will get constant employment. They next went to the house of Patrick and J. Collins. Furniture was also removed in the yard. There was no one in the house but the young man's wife, her children, and some hens. After a little time they were put out, and the door locked. The men were not present, they have a house taken at Ballinascarthy, and will also get constant employment. On coming to the house of John Crowley removed the furniture was in the yard. The poor woman and family had put out the remainder of the little things. She and her children were crying; the husband was not present. They next went to the house of Charles McCarthy, Dadgel Crowley, James Donovan, and Ellen Hurley. It was found that all their furniture was removed, and they had left the next morning. Houses are provided for all the laborers evicted, and, doubtless, employment will soon be provided, so that the spring work in a suit to commence, so that the laborers will not suffer, for, notwithstanding Mr. Bence Jones boasting about their high wages, they are miserably off, and have nothing during their time. Only seven of the old hands have returned, although liberal inducements were held out, as they were all faithful, honest, hard-working men, and gave great satisfaction. Several others of the old hands are summoned for possession to the Timoleague Sessions, who will also be evicted.

MRS. PARNELL ON THE CRISIS.

Her Views of the Present Aspect of Affairs in America and Ireland.

First Land League Started in San Francisco

Mrs. Parnell, mother of Charles Stewart Parnell, the famous tenants' right champion, is in New York city. She is a large, comely-looking lady, and imparts a friendly feeling upon first sight. Her dress is plain, but rich, and betokens good taste and breeding. A small lace cap covered her head, and she was engaged in perusing several Dublin newspapers when the reporter entered. Upon the object of the visit being known, Mrs. Parnell at once entered into a warm and very liberal discourse on the prospects of the work to be done by the women in the movement in which she is so much interested, and of the Land League and its managers in general. Mrs. Parnell is an accomplished linguist, and her conversational power never allows the interest of the listener to flag. In speaking of the work in this country, she said: "I am very sorry that the movement in this country has not yet partaken of more than an amusement aspect. It is an entertainment to the people to go to balls and hear lectures and nice music and singing. Of course these affairs are a means of revenue, it must be admitted, but they do not give the people of America, especially the real American portion, at all a correct idea of the stern reality which the poor tenants of the old country are facing every day."

"What do you think of the movement in this country, Mrs. Parnell?"

"It will be a grand success if it is properly managed. What is wanted is a man of great ability who will devote his whole time to the management of the business of the league. I only wish we could find a man who would become Washington-like in this movement; who would give himself up entirely to it. Of course the men at the head of it in this country all have their business to attend to, and they cannot do great things. Why, look at the leaders in Ireland. Mr. Kim, treasurer of the League, has gone to remain in Paris. He has not been near his large mills in Dublin in months. Mr. Brennan gave up a fine position in a large mercantile house to work for the cause. Mr. Dillon is a physician and sacrificed his practice. My son has not visited his estates for a long time. He has reduced his rents until his income is only one-quarter what it formerly was, and that quarter he gives to the league."

MONEY FOR THE SUFFERERS.

"How about the recent dispute about the proper parties to receive money in this country for the League?"

"Are you that I don't know. I never heard Miss Ford tell anybody to send money to her brother, the editor of the Irish World. I don't think Father Walsh can look out for all the subscriptions received in this country. What I would recommend is to send all subscriptions direct to Mr. Parnell, at Paris. Then they will be sure of acknowledgment."

"How many Ladies' Leagues are there in the country?"

"I have helped to organize about forty, but there are many more. The first one was formed in San Francisco. We organized one in Newport, the president of which is a grand-daughter of Henry Grattan Forty. Speaking of Ladies' Leagues, I would recommend them to look after their own business. It gives them more confidence, and there will be more freedom of speech and action than if they were under the chair officer. I would also advise them to send their money separately, and not send it with the local men's League. This will be a source of jealousy and dissension, and will inspire the women to excel the men."

A GRAND MOVEMENT.

"What do you intend to do after your lecturing tour, Mrs. Parnell?"

"I am going to write to my son and find out in what condition he is, and especially the ladies who are busy in distributing aid, will be after the Enforcement Act. You know there is a clause in it under which women and children may be a vested who participate in the movement. If I find they are not in a condition to continue the work, I will go out there myself and do what I can to encourage them, and take part in the work myself. Being an American citizen, they may not arrest me as quickly as the others. What we must do is, when one is arrested, have another take her place, and so continue the work of relieving the evicted tenants. The Government can't arrest the wh

THE MONITOR.

TWENTY FOURTH YEAR OF PUBLICATION.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

THURSDAY..... APRIL 7.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

Mr. S. J. McCormick is now on a canvassing and collecting tour in the interest of the Monitor. He will visit Gilroy, Hollister, Watsonville, Santa Cruz, Monterey, and intermediate points. We hope the Clergy and our friends in any section he may visit will help him in promoting the interests of this organ of their faith. During his absence Mr. McCormick will send us correspondence from the several points where Catholic affairs are of sufficient importance. We ask our subscribers in any place he may visit to be prepared to renew their subscriptions and to help add an additional name to our increasing list of Monitor readers.

What a United Catholic People have Accomplished.

There is no saying more true than "union is strength," and we see this truism frequently demonstrated, both in the civil, as well as the religious sphere. Just now, it is demonstrated in Belgium, in such a remarkable degree, as to cause astonishment in the minds of us, cold and cowardly Catholics of America who are temporizing and toying with an evil, which is destined to destroy the faith in millions of souls unless some St. George shall arise, in order to destroy the dragon that is ravaging the region inhabited by ten millions of Catholics. "Make education more Christian" was almost the last expiring appeal of Pius the Great to the Catholics of the world, yet his words found but weak response in the hearts of those who "have eyes and do not see, have ears and do not hear."

Belgium contains but four million Catholics, yet these brave, generous and united people have been able to accomplish more in one year for Catholic education than the ten million timorous Catholics of America could accomplish in ten years. The reason of this is because the Belgian Catholics are in earnest. They sincerely believe, that as pastors and parents, they are responsible to Almighty God for the salvation of the souls of the children sent to them so that they may be made co-heirs of the kingdom of heaven. On the contrary, we, Catholics in America, think we can have our children admired, respected, and Americanized by sending our children to graduate in the public schools, from whence they receive the devil's diploma which authorizes them to practice everything except their religion.

Pastors wonder why the young men and young women of the parish do not approach the Sacraments more frequently; parents wonder why their children are so disrespectful and disobedient; society asks: "What shall we do with our boys and our girls?" Yet, in the meantime, the devil's mill keeps grinding away at the wheat of faith, pulverizing it out of the souls of the children who come "between the upper and the nether millstone," and all Catholic pastors and Catholic parents receive, in return for the grist of God-like innocent souls they sent to the devils' mill, a handfull of unChristian chaff and "thirty pieces of silver"—the reward of Judas for betraying the Son of God!

This is the programme of perdition which Catholics of America—who send their children away from Catholic schools—have prepared for the innocent souls of those unfortunate children whom they "educate" to become a curse to the Church and to society. Let us now contrast the conduct of the Catholics of Belgium with our vacillating and vicious course, and let us also learn from them the only lesson which makes life worth living for—that of knowing and serving God and raising up a Catholic youth who will continue to praise and love Him when we have returned to the dust from whence we sprung.

A few years ago the Belgian Government determined to destroy the Catholic Church, and the first movement towards that diabolical work was effected by taking the control of the schools from Catholic influences. The school buildings, school furniture, and everything appertaining to education, became Government property; men and women of "advanced ideas" were appointed as teachers, with the command that nothing Catholic should be introduced into the course of study, and when all this was accomplished, the Government thought it had driven the first nail in the coffin which was to confine the Catholic Church in Belgium. But the enemies of the Church were foiled, even in the incipiency of their work, because school houses and school teachers are entirely useless without scholars, and, although the Government offered great advantages to parents who would send their children to those godless schools, the brave Catholic parents of Belgium said to the tempter: "Get thee behind me, Satan." They not only refused the bribe offered them, in exchange for the souls of their children, but they resolved to establish schools of their own, and thus save their children' souls from the snares of Satan. The Bishops at once counselled their flocks to stand firm to their faith, and the noble response which the Belgian Catholics gave to the appeal of their pastors is one of the grandest proofs of the fidelity of a great Catholic people. Every parish determined to have its own Catholic school, supported by local aid alone; and the result has been so satisfactory, that the public schools supported by Government, have been left most tenantless. Societies were formed in every parish for the purpose of organizing, supporting and conducting Catholic schools of the grade required by the pupils therein, and rich and poor, alike, contributed generously to the funds required for this important enterprise. In one family alone, the D'Arembergs', of Brussels, built one hundred school houses as their contribution towards Catholic education. The bishops, the clergy and the laity vied with each other in their munificence towards this great struggle of religion against infidelity, and God has blessed their charity in a wonderful way, as evinced by the following statistics:

The 76 Catholic primary schools of the arrondissement of Alost contain 22,295 pupils, whilst the Government schools have but 3,536; in attendance, some of these schools having but ten pupils, and a majority of them have but 25 children on the roll.

At Ilelcele there are 660 children attending the Catholic schools, whilst the Government schools are without a single occupant.

At Beverin, 1,342 Catholic pupils, to 9 in the public school.

At Cruyshelu, 567 Catholic pupils to 8 in the Government schools.

At Haeslonck, 558 Catholic pupils, whilst the three children of the schoolmaster are all the scholars the Government can coerce into their establishment.

At Linay, 857 Catholic pupils, to 18 in the Government schools.

At Vracene, 526 Catholic pupils to 5 in the Government register. And thus it is all over Belgium, where fully eighty per cent. of the Catholic children attend Catholic schools, the other twenty per cent. being largely made up of from the families of Catholic teachers and other employees hired for the purpose of entrapping Catholic children into the godless schools of the State.

Here is a record which may well make the Catholics of America hang their heads in very shame at the cowardice and timidity with which they have permitted the public school question to override their religious belief. We have joined the populace in their worship of secular education, and thus virtually denied God before men; we have seen the evil of godless education growing greater, year by year, yet the Catholic laity have done but little to stay the sad have of faith among the youth of America. But now that the Catholics of Belgium have pointed out to us how to save the souls of our children from the snares of Satan, let us hope that the Catholics of America will awaken from their lethargy, that they will sustain the schools already established by Bishops, Priests and Religious orders, and organize new schools in every section of the country, until we perfect a system of education which will save the rising generation from the loss of faith.

Building churches for this generation is a glorious work, but, unless we can place a school house beside every church in America, our labor is only half accomplished. We must educate our children in the faith if we desire to have them occupy our places in the Church in the future, and if we desire them to share with us the rewards of a future eternity, promised to those who "take up the Cross" and follow in the way of the Lord.

Polygamy and Divorce.

The President, in his inaugural address, and on many occasions since, has given assurances that he will stamp out polygamy in Utah, if it should take all his constitutional powers to do so. We are glad to hear Mormonism is going to suffer decapitation at the hands of the President, and we humbly trust and pray, that whilst his hand is in, he will cast his eye over the nation and see whether polygamy does not exist outside of Mormondom. Though not called Mormons, we believe there are a great many in every state of the Union, aye, even in Washington, within smell of a Presidential nose, who, under the name of Baptist, Methodist, Campbellite, etc., have more wives than the Christian law allows. Of course, these men are not so indiscreet as to keep such wives Harem style, in the same house, or, Mormon style, in adjoining houses. That would shock the susceptible Christian feelings of the community, and these gentlemen, some of whom are in high places and close to the White House, contrive to keep wives number 2, number 3, etc., at a safe distance. The wonderful facility, with which divorces are now obtained, is such, that it is a question with some divorced men and women, who have gone several times through the mill, whether they are married or not, and, if married, what particular person or persons can claim their conjugal affections. So far has this thing gone, that some of the New York papers are urging the necessity of a uniform divorce and marriage law for the whole country. As things are at present, the whole question of marriage and divorce is a muddle, and it is very potable for a man and woman to be united to each other, or dissmissed, in one State, without the leave or its dissolution being recognized in another.

This is a question, however, which the general government has no control over, as it belongs, and can only be regulated, by the several States. As State legislatures are mostly controlled by lawyers, who get fat fees in divorce cases, it is not likely relief can be expected in that quarter. The whole truth of it is, society is rotten from top to bottom, and Mormonism is to be made the scape-goat to suffer for the sins of tricky politicians, hypocritical church members, wealthy profligates, and the rag, tag and bob tail of American society generally. "What, therefore, God has joined together, let no man put asunder," is the unmistakable Scriptural injunction, and, so long as that is disregarded, all efforts to regulate this question, whether in or out of Mormondom, will, and should fail.

The Victorious Boers.

England has yielded to the persuasive powers of the Boers. The argument used were those of the "Enfield," "Martini-Henry" kind, and they struck home. It would naturally be expected, that after the whipping she received, England would never be satisfied until she inflicted bloody vengeance upon the hardy few who dared to defy her. The "Jingoes" of Great Britain cried out: "There must be no peace with dishonor." "Save the honor of the flag," etc.; but, in spite of all, the independence of the Boers has been agreed to, and England stops down and out from the high and haughty position she so lately assumed in Southern Africa. What has caused this humiliating surrender on the part of England! Surely, with the exhaustless resources of money, men, and arms at her command, she could quickly crush a mere handful of colonists, far removed from the center of civilization. No doubt she could, and would, too, were it not that the voice of public opinion—the voice of outraged humanity—was heard, everywhere, crying aloud in condemnation of her unjust and cruel course. England has about run her full course in subjugating petty, half-civilized tribes and nations—adding their territories to her own wide-spread, unwieldy empire. It is high time she should receive a check. As long as it was against Caffirs, Zulus, Afghans and such like, that England fought, the civilized world looked on with coldness and indifference. But when she attempts to enslave, and bring under her rule, an unwilling and brave white race, the liberty-loving people, of every land, protest in a manner that cannot be misunderstood.

To conquer the former was, comparatively, an easy task, as they were mere Nomads, unprovided with breech-loaders and other destructive instruments of warfare which have, but recently, been invented. The Boers, on the contrary—having daily practice in the use of the rifle, hunting game, etc., among the fastnesses of their territory—brought down a red-coat at every pop, and taught John Bull how two could play at his favorite game of "stamping out."

The ancestors of these brave Boers—the Hollanders—taught a similar lesson to the great Napoleon, when they threw down their dykes, and let the waters of the German ocean inundate their fair land, carrying destruction in their wake, rather than surrender it to the conqueror. We say, all honor to the gallant people who, though they knew the strife was vain, yet dared the issue—

"Blest to be,
Even one single moment free,
And die in pause of liberty."

Vandal Journalism.

We hope one good result of recent sensational events in this city will be the dawn of a new era of respectable journalism. The fair name and fame of San Francisco, in the past, have been blurred and marred by a class of newspapers which fed and fattened upon damaged reputations, dragging them about with selfish recklessness and exposing their naked and revolting deformities to the public gaze. Such exposures, such sickening details, may minister to the ghoulish tastes of morbid and vitiated minds, but the pure and decent turn from them in nausea and disgust.

For a long time, respectable citizens feared to touch such newspapers for fear their fingers would be defiled, and, on no account, would they permit them to enter within the sacred precincts of the family circle lest the minds of the tender ones at home should be contaminated by the filth contained in their columns.

This city has been cursed, as no other city in the United States has, with a class of journals of obscure shanty which subsist by the most questionable means, and, for deliverance from which, the people should pray as from one of the seven plagues of Egypt. Fair, just criticism of the life and character of publicans, of men seeking the suffrages of their fellow-citizens, is, of course, perfectly justifiable.

But, reflecting on the members of their families, dragging into light their private concerns, exposing the skeleton in the closet at home, is highly reprehensible and should not be tolerated. We hope the day of personal journalism, in San Francisco, is past. We hope newspapers that live on blackmail, that are fed on corporation pap, that truckle to monopolies, that "bend the pregnant hinges of the knee" to shoddy aristocrats that "thrift may follow fawning," will be ostracized by all decent men in the community. A pure and patriotic course is not to be expected from such organs of public opinion (God save the mark!) as have pet schemes and jobs to push through legislative and corporate bodies, as go hand in glove with professional lobbyists and politicians, as are ever ready to shake or puff, to praise or dispraise, for ready coin. We can however expect from them, from all, and should have, and, we sincerely hope from this time on, will have decent, impersonal journalism.

Great Speech of Parnell.

We give, entire, Parnell's eloquent speech on the second reading of the Arn's Bill. It is a terrible, scathing arraignment of the Gladstone Government, and will repay perusal. It completely refutes the foul calumnies of the Home Secretary, justifies the actions and language of the Home Rule leaders, and proves the hypocrisy and dissimulation of the English Government in her treatment of Ireland.

How to Crush Nihilism.

After repeated failures, the Nihilists, at last, have succeeded in their bloody design of assassinating the Czar of Russia, Alexander II., and have sent him, "with all his accounts upon his head," a loading, writhing fragment of humanity, before the judgment seat of the King of Kings. It was a terrible fate, shocking in all its details, dastardly in its method, and wholly without palliation or justification. The question that now agitates, not only his successor, but all the crowned heads of Europe, is how to put down Nihilism. In order to solve this perplexing problem, it is necessary to ascertain the causes which brought forth this harrowing monster whose whet of appetite is only increased by the ghastly nature of the things it feeds upon. The social, political, and religious fabric of Russia is rotten to the core. In the days of Peter and Catherine, the Russian people were a coarse, benotted, brutal race, held in sullen subjection by an iron hand. Occasionally their ferocious instincts would lead them to break from their halters, but the sleepless vigilance and indomitable power of their rulers mastered and crushed them. The policy, which guided the Russians, in those days, in the government of their subjects, has continued to this day.

The people had neither voice, nor representation in the Councils of the nation. They had no will, which they could call their own. The Czar was everything—emperor, high-priest, autocrat—whose word alone was the only law. As long as the people were mere serfs, confined within the narrow limits of their hamlets, shut out from the knowledge to be obtained in common schools, ignorant of the manners, customs and freedom enjoyed by other nations of Europe—so long was it a comparatively easy thing to govern Russia. But when the emancipated Czar, by one stroke of his pen, emancipated the serfs, when schools and colleges were opened to all classes, when the people learned, by travel abroad and from supporting visitors, the blessings of freedom, which others enjoyed, they naturally asked the question why they should be excluded from such blessings.

The Russian people are naturally an intelligent race. They see around them a corrupt, venal crew of government officials whi plunder, and rint, and act generally, as petty tyrants only can. They see religion barbarized and disgraced by an ignorant, benotted, lecherous clergy. They hear of road of scandals in high places, of peculation, simony, and adultery in the Imperial Court itself. And they ask are these things going to last, and are they to wallow in the mire forever under the heel of such rulers? Alexander II threw away golden opportunities. If he had followed up his act of emancipation by applying the axe to the root of the grievances herein set forth, his life would have been spared, and Nihilism would never have seen the light, or, if so, would have been quickly extinguished by a grateful people.

He raised their hopes of having a constitutional government, he gave them the taste of freedom, and then dashed the tempting cup from their lips. Unfortunately, he was intoxicated with the love of power, and in his drunken frenzy lanished forty thousand of his Polish subjects to the mines of Siberia, there to perish by a lingering death of torture and slavery. Though conquered, the Poles were not subdued, and the Emperor found, to his cost, that "desperation had but nerved the fight which valor had begun."

By such barbarous tyranny he transformed a band of rebels into a nest of conspirators, whose ramifications extended into every part of his dominions, and whose principles permeated every class, from the noble to the peasant. Nihilism cannot be crushed by the terrors of Siberian exile, nor by torture, nor by the knout, nor by the knouted to death. In the broad daylight of this nineteenth century, civilization will prove in Russia, as in Ireland and other oppressed nations, but a lamentable failure, likely to be followed by terrible and bloody reprisals. Let the present Emperor, then, heed the lesson taught by the awful fate of Charles I. of England, Louis XVI. of France, and his own immediate predecessor, and be guided, as a wise ruler should, by that wisdom which comes from on high.

Let him take to his counsels wise and experienced men who will frame a constitution modelled after the best, one that will be acceptable to his people. Let him unloose his hearish grasp from fair Poland, and restore to her that freedom which "shrieked when Kosciusko fell." Let him exterminate the hydra-headed monster of corruption that is tearing at the vitals of his empire. Let full freedom of religious worship be established throughout his entire dominion. By so doing, Nihilism will be grappled with and strangled in its strong hold, and "the innocent sleep that knits up the raveled sleave of care," will visit, nightly, the Czar's pillow.

Pixley Appeals Archbishop McCabe.

By one of those strange freaks, for which Frank Pixley has become notorious, we find him putting Archbishop McCabe of Dublin familiarly on the back, because he thinks that prelate is opposed to the Land Leagues. In this respect, however, Pixley reckons without his host, as the MONITOR has already quoted paragraphs from the Archbishop's Pastoral, which are strongly in favor of constitutional agitation, in order to remedy the wrongs under which Ireland has so long and so patiently suffered. Besides, fanatical Frank should remember that Archbishop McCabe belongs to "the Pope's Irish," of whom Pixley has a holy horror, and his commendation of the Archbishop of Dublin only shows how incomparably he is, in his prejudice.

EDITORIAL CORRESPONCE.

San Jose and Its surroundings A Catholic City Whose Churches and Schools are Prosperingly Patronized.

San Jose came down on Saturday afternoon, I was fairly astonished at the number of people gathered on the streets and the commercial prosperity indicated by the magnificent stores and the large stocks displayed by those engaged in commerce in this thriving and beautiful city.

In regard to churches and schools, the Catholics of San Jose may well feel proud of the facilities by which they are surrounded for attending to their religious duties, as well as securing for their children the benefits of a truly Christian education. There are two Catholic churches in this city, both built of brick, and both superior specimens of church architecture.

ST. JOSEPH'S CHURCH,

under charge of the Jesuit Fathers, of whom Rev. N. Congiato, S. J., is Superior, is a magnificent structure in the form of a Greek cross. The interior design and decoration is beautiful, having a seating capacity of 2,000 and place, for seven altars. When completed, this will be the finest Catholic church in the State, outside of San Francisco. It is attended by very large congregations at each of the four Masses on Sunday, and the attendance, at the Lenten services and week-day Masses, is remarkably good. Rev. N. Congiato, S. J., is pastor, assisted by Fathers Barchi, Pinasco, Travers, Leonard, and other members of the Society of Jesus. Thus far the church has cost $65,000, and it is estimated that $35,000 more will be required to complete it in detail. The Jesuits also supervise where nearly a hundred and fifty boys receive instruction under a corps of teachers belonging to the order. It was gratifying to learn that nearly every Catholic child in San Jose attended the Catholic school.

ST. JOSEPH'S NORMAL SCHOOL,

ST. PATRICK'S CHURCH is located on the corner of Santa Clara and Eighth streets, and is under the pastoral charge of Rev. P. J. Dowling. It is a neat brick structure, capable of seating about seven hundred persons, and the interior presents a very pretty appearance. The stained glass windows were donated by a number of parishioners, whose names bear the different mementos they so generously offered in order to beautify the House of God. The pastor's residence is next the church, and has just been completed. Like all the private residences here, it is embellished with a good flower garden, and in this respect San Jose well deserves the name by which it is designated—the Garden City.

THE COLLEGE OF NOTRE DAME

This superb and famous institution is under the supervision of the Sisters of Notre Dame, who originally located in Oregon and removed hither in 1851. The main brick edifice is one hundred and sixty feet long, with a wing on the east side running back one hundred and forty feet. Adjoining the buildings are extensive recreation grounds and gardens which must be seen in order to be fully appreciated. Whilst visiting the institution I had the great happiness of receiving the accompanying photo of Mother Cecilia and Sister Mary Catherine, whom I first met in Oregon thirty years ago, and who alone remain of the six Sisters who sailed from Havre, France, in 1851, for the distant mission of the then Oregon Territory, the others having been called to the blessed reward promised to the good and faithful servants of Almighty God.

While passing through this vast educational institution I was satisfied and delighted to learn that upwards of attended the different departments in this establishment, divided as follows: In the boarding-school for young ladies, 111; in the select day-school for girls, 125; St. Joseph's day-school for girls, 225; St. Joseph's day-school for small boys, 170. Total, 636. The class rooms and dormitories are models of neatness and remarkably well ventilated, and such care do the Sisters take of their scholars that in a single case of sickness existed among this unusually large number of children. Everywhere I went, I heard the familiar sound of the piano, there being twenty-four of them in almost constant use during the day. The Sisters also have harps, organs and guitars for the use of numerous pupils who desire to learn those instruments. There are engaged in the various departments, and the neatness which marked every room from the parlors to the dormitories attested the skill and industry, which they manifested in keeping this extensive establishment in the most perfect order.

SIX HUNDRED PUPILS

FIFTY TWO SISTERS OF NOTRE DAME

This college possesses all the necessary apparatus for teaching a thorough course of philosophy, also splendid cabinets of minerals, shells, coins, and cases of stuffed birds and animals, for the study of mineralogy, conchology, numismatics and natural history.

Pupils of any denomination are received, and no interference made with their religious convictions, there being at present in the institution a number of young ladies who are not Catholics. The pupils are taught every branch of useful industry, as well as all the accomplishments calculated to fit young ladies to enter the most refined society, and many of the graduates of San Jose College are at present among the most gifted and talented ladies of the Golden State.

In addition to this Mother House of the order, the Sisters of Notre Dame have numerous schools in other portions of the State, and on last Monday they opened a branch academy at Alameda, where Father Gibeson is earnestly at work in the praiseworthy effort of securing the benefits of Christian education for the children of that vicinity.

During my rambles through San Jose I ascended the

from whence a beautiful bird's-eye view of the city and surrounding scenery can be obtained. The prospect was one of the most pleasing I ever beheld, and all visitors to this place should avail themselves of the opportunity to gaze upon a landscape that for beauty, extent, and variety cannot be surpassed in the State.

The citizens of San Jose may well be proud of their public buildings, the city abounding in churches and school-houses that are models of architecture, whilst the banks and blocks of business houses are erected with a taste that at once attests the pride which their owners feel in making this city a charming place of residence for rich and poor alike.

Everywhere I visit I find the friends of the Monitor both numerous and energetic in aiding my efforts to place the paper in every Catholic household in California. My thanks are specially due to Father Dumpsey of San Mateo, Rev. J. Pinasco, S. J., of San Clara, Mr. Hughes of the same place, Rev. N. Congiato, S. J., Rev. P. J. Dowling, and Mr. J. J. Devine, of this city, for their co-operation in enabling me to secure large numbers of new subscribers, and also for the great kindness they manifested towards myself personally.

Pixley Doesn't Like Those Catholic Bells

In the December of the 29th ult., Pixley said of the Irish only kept away from the wound of those Papish bells, they would make excellent citizens of his stripe. Similar testimony was given in this city, before the Chinese Commission of Inquiry, presided over by the defeated Senator Morton, in relation to Irish servant girls. Those "bells, bells, bells," sound ominously in the ears of those who dislike the Pope's Irish. To them those sounds are not

"Sweeter
Than the dome of Peter
Flings o'er the Tiber, pealing solemnly."

Oh!

"Bells they're as bitter
As a horrid litter
Of "Black and Tans" squealing furiously."

They sound to him like the alarming tone which struck on the ear of Macbeth after the murder of Duncan. He

"Hear it not, (Pixley), for it is the knell
Which summons thee to heaven or hell."

The "Hebrew Observer" on Pixley.

We subjoin an editorial, which appeared in last week's issue of the Hebrew Observer, scoring Pixley for his vandal attacks upon our Irish fellow-citizens. In common with all the respectable, religious, and law-abiding people of this community, they see the necessity of hurling back, into the teeth of this foul-mouthed editor, the filth wickly thrown through the columns of the Argonaut. The Jews should be the last when Pixley would dare to attack, for they are of his own kith and kin—the mark of the race on him being palpable—although, forty thousand of his Polish subjects to the mines of Siberia, there to perish by a lingering death of torture and slavery. Though conquered, the Poles were not subdued, and the Emperor found, to his cost, that "desperation had but nerved the fight which valor had begun."

This college possesses all the necessary apparatus for teaching a thorough course of philosophy, also splendid cabinets of minerals, shells, coins, and cases of stuffed birds and animals, for the study of mineralogy, conchology, numismatics and natural history.

Pupils of any denomination are received, and no interference made with their religious convictions, there being at present in the institution a number of young ladies who are not Catholics. The pupils are taught every branch of useful industry, as well as all the accomplishments calculated to fit young ladies to enter the most refined society, and many of the graduates of San Jose College are at present among the most gifted and talented ladies of the Golden State.

In addition to this Mother House of the order, the Sisters of Notre Dame have numerous schools in other portions of the State, and on last Monday they opened a branch academy at Alameda, where Father Gibeson is earnestly at work in the praiseworthy effort of securing the benefits of Christian education for the children of that vicinity.

During my rambles through San Jose I ascended the

from whence a beautiful bird's-eye view of the city and surrounding scenery can be obtained. The prospect was one of the most pleasing I ever beheld, and all visitors to this place should avail themselves of the opportunity to gaze upon a landscape that for beauty, extent, and variety cannot be surpassed in the State.

The citizens of San Jose may well be proud of their public buildings, the city abounding in churches and school-houses that are models of architecture, whilst the banks and blocks of business houses are erected with a taste that at once attests the pride which their owners feel in making this city a charming place of residence for rich and poor alike.

Everywhere I visit I find the friends of the Monitor both numerous and energetic in aiding my efforts to place the paper in every Catholic household in California. My thanks are specially due to Father Dumpsey of San Mateo, Rev. J. Pinasco, S. J., of San Clara, Mr. Hughes of the same place, Rev. N. Congiato, S. J., Rev. P. J. Dowling, and Mr. J. J. Devine, of this city, for their co-operation in enabling me to secure large numbers of new subscribers, and also for the great kindness they manifested towards myself personally.

Davitt Testimonial Fund.

We are glad to perceive the Irishmen of Canada have taken hold of this excellent movement. The True Witness of Montreal has opened its column to subscribers, and quite a large amount has been already subscribed. We hope California, where it first originated, will not flag, but will, as soon as possible, remit its quota for the Fund.

The Long Expected Land Bill.

At last, on this day, as we go press, Gladstone will introduce the long delayed, much looked for Land Bill. On another page will be found some particulars about it, which have leaked out, and been telegraphed thither. It is too soon yet to pass any opinion upon the nortured this bill. We hope it will be all its authors have promised—that it will be a "sweeping measure" of reform in the existing relations between landlord and tenant in Ireland.

DEATH OF REV. D. F. DEMPSEY OF SAN MATEO.

It is with deep pain and regret that we have to announce the death of this estimable clergyman, the pastoral residence, in San Mateo, last Tuesday morning, the 5th inst.

The news will be deeply felt and lamented, not alone his own flock, who have lost a dearly beloved and model pastor, but by all the clergy and people of the Archdiocese who had the happiness of knowing him.

A good priest, a whole-souled patriot, a generous and sympathetic friend, such was the character of the departed. Rev. Father Dempsey was a native of Ireland, and, if we mistake not, he was ordained in the Diocese of Dublin, and, after a short time, he came to this country, and, for the purpose of learning ourselves into a permanent school, the Irish Land League, and I think after a little time, we will compare favorably with any of the Irish Branches in number. "Seven Branch Irish National Land League," the officers are as follows: Branch 1, President, Land Committee, Vice President; Branch 2 Secretary, Treasurer, Vice President; Branch 3 Secretary, Treasurer, Vice President; Branch 4 Secretary, Treasurer, Vice President; Branch 5 Secretary, Treasurer, Vice President; Branch 6 Secretary, Treasurer, Vice President; Branch 7 Secretary, Treasurer, Vice President. Yours truly,

P. J. McKenna, Sec.

Ladies' Land League.

The ladies of St. John's Branch of the Irish National Land and Industrial League met Sunday afternoon at St. John's Hall on Eddy street, and organized a branch. There was large attendance the hall being crowded with ladies in sympathy with their sex and the cause of Ireland. Father Ecuey gave a very interesting address, in which he spoke against Catholics, especially during the reigns of William III and Mary, when Ireland was under the Penal laws, and exhibited the sufferings of various men of intellect. Father Ecuey was followed by Mr. Spillane, who very forcibly spoke on the subject of the oppression of the Irish in Ireland. Several new members were added to the roll, and after an exhortation from the Chairman for the encouragement of all members, the meeting adjourned.

San Jose Land League.

A meeting of the San Jose Land League was held on last Sunday, at which a report of the Treasurer was read, showing that the Irish-American citizens of that thriving city had collected the sum of $2,200, to be forwarded by the League, and they have a project under way which will swell this amount to fifty a thousand dollars. The Branch is named after Michael Davitt, has very efficient officers, and a membership of more than a hundred. At the conclusion of the regular business of the meeting, Mr. S. J. McCormick made a brief address, in which he contrasted the amicable feeling of the Irish people towards which existed among them, the fanaticism which characterized their proceedings, and the real true statesmanship of Mr. Parnell, who presides present struggle. He also read the appeal of the Irish National Land Leaguers, which was received with applause, and funds for which will shortly be forwarded to the treasury in this city.

Land League at Temescal.

The following resolutions were adopted at a regular meeting of Temescal Branch, No. 2, Irish National Land League, held March 25th, at Temescal:

T. FLANAGAN, Esq., Sec'y Land League.

DEAR SIR: Your circular letter was received large as it should be, it being first Mass Sunday, and the country people do not assemble as at late. I am glad to be able to congratulate you on finding you that we were entirely pleased with the objects of the Land League. The Irish, the able form in which he handled the subject of our native land; it is the, a deal of good. We will be glad to meet the gentlemen and patriots again.

You will receive through Wells, Fargo & Co. gross one hundred and thirty dollars ($200), and ten dollars ($10), for the Parnell Fund. Because knowledge the same by next Monitor, or by notice, if you think best. I expect to send you another little sum in a short time.

Respectfully yours,

DEDICATION OF A CONVENT IN ALAMEDA.

The Convent lately erected in Alameda, by the sisters of Notre Dame, was formally dedicated on Sunday week, by the Most Rev. Archbishop. A large congregation attended the ceremony which took place immediately after Mass in the Church adjoining the Convent. A large number of the clergy were also present, including Fathers Gleason and Gallagher, of Brooklyn; Father Scollan, of Oakland; Father McCready, of San Leandro; Father Shealy, of Hayward; Father Ferrier, of Mission San Jose; Father Bell, of San Leandro; and Father Dunne, of Oakland. The Archbishop officiated, and the Rev. Father Gleason preached a sermon from the text of Isaiah, 54th chapter, 13th verse, "And all thy children shall be taught of the Lord, and great shall be the peace of thy children." The sermon was an admirable brief treatise on the subject, Mr. Wm. E. Clarke, of Providence, R.I., has given the result of several years experience, showing that Dobbin's Disease as a dangerous malady in cases where practical destruction of the Kidneys has already ensued. The sole medicine used to cure is HUNT'S REMEDY, the Great Kidney and Liver Medicine.

TO THE TENANT FARMERS OF IRELAND.

"Fix a tone of Ireland is in the keeping of the tenant farmers. Upon their action, during the next few months, depends the future of Ireland for generations."—Parnell.

Stand by the Land League, Irishmen!
Stand true, for your cause is just,
Rather to shoulder, hand in hand—
Swear, by the God you trust—
Your martyred fathers' graves,
That the time has come when the English yoke
Shall fall from the Irish slaves.

Stand by the Land League, Irishmen!
Stand closer through the gloom,
Will you weakly yield while DAVITT bears
For you the felon's doom?
Will you turn from the brave men in the gap?
The heralds of freedom's sun,
In the face of the world, will you buy your chain
Rather than battle to shake it off?

Stand by the Land League—Irishmen!
Will you fail in the trying hour,
When the dawn, knowing the end draws near,
Begins forth the desperate power?
Will you falter and faint while Cherbin throws
Its lightning over the land?
Will you, Irishmen, if you are
Shoulder to shoulder stand?

Stand by the Land League—Irishmen!
By all the weary years
By the million graves by Famine filled—
By the oceans of blood and tears—
By the broken hearts of the exiles driven
To die in a foreign land—
By your martyred dead—by your hope of Heaven,
Shoulder to shoulder stand!

IRISH LAND LEAGUE.

Enthusiastic Meeting of Branch No. 1.

Branch No. 1 of the Irish National Land League of this city held its regular weekly meeting last Monday evening at Irish American Hall. The attendance was very large, all the seats in the hall being occupied, and a great number of ladies forming part of the audience. The following communication was read, and received the heartiest applause:

The Sun Flower, Cal., Secretary Irish National Land League, No. 1.—Dear Sir—The object for which our association has been formed is one that not only appeals to the better impulses of the human heart, but it is one that requires financial and bravery if forward to a successful termination. We, therefore, do lose no the sum of fifty dollars, to aid you in your good work, and accompany it with our best wishes for the fullest realization of your hopes.

Very respectfully,
SUN FLOWER LAND COMPANY.
(PER JNO. WHITE.)

The report of the Committee appointed to examine the books of the Branch, in order to ascertain the financial condition of the Branch, reported that up to the date of the last meeting of the Branch amounted to the very handsome sum of $2,126.90, while the total expenses amounted to only $127.40. The Committee paid a high tribute to Secretary Flanagan for the excellent manner in which the books of the Branch had been kept by him. A vote of thanks to the Chair for the donation, and also for the interest it has taken in the action of the Parnell Testimonial Fund, was unanimously tendered him.

D. J. Tooby, the President of the Branch, then read a letter from the Sun Flower, from the columns of an evening contemporary, and said that ever since the Branch had been in existence it has received both financial aid and sympathy and encouragement from the Sun Flower and people, and that the least one can do is to pay this splendid organization. The Chairman then extended a cordial invitation to those present to join the Branch, or to contribute to the objects of the organization. The invitation was cordially responded to by a number of ladies and gentlemen, who at once signed the roll, and paid to the Secretary. While the process of joining the Branch was going on, the Secretary read a letter from the audience, selling pamphlets containing a sketch of the life of Michael Davitt. The sale was very successful. The receipts of the Branch for the evening were $[illegible], and the full contents 150 copies.

What Good Wives Should Resemble.

Good wives to smile should be akin,
Always their homes keep within,
But not to carry (fashion's backs)
All they are worth upon their backs.

Good wives, like city clocks, should be Exact, with regularity;
But not, like city clocks, so loud,
To be heard by all the vulgar crowd.

Good wives, like echoes, should be true,
And speak but when they're spoken to;
Not, like echo, so absurd,
To have forever the last word.

Loving His Dogs Better than His Wife.

A case was heard by the Southport (England) magistrates which once more demonstrates the love which some men have for dogs. A young "gentleman" named Thomas Thorpe, living at Southport, who is said to be in the receipt of £226 a year from property, besides what he has earned from his profession, was charged with having on the 29th of November assaulted his wife. The evidence went to show that they had been married for several years, and for the past five years he had ill-used her most shamefully, beating her three or four times every week. If she neglected to feed his dogs he used to break out in the most awful passion, and he had recently become so violent that she was now really afraid that he would do her serious injury. On this occasion he, as soon as he arrived at home, asked her if she had fed the dogs, to which she replied that they had been attended to. Being doubtful of this, he began to curse and swear and strike her. She implored him not to ill-use her for a dog, but he only became worse. He struck her a violent blow in the face, knocked her down, and kicked her several times. On one occasion he opened her head in two places with a chopping board. Prisoner had no defence to offer for his strange conduct. For the assault a fine of forty shillings and costs was imposed, including the advocate's fee, and a deed of separation was also granted, he having to allow his wife twenty shillings a week.

Watch the Pigs.

Do not neglect the pigs and leave them to "root hog or die" during the winter. The loss resulting they have to do now the better off they will be in the spring. Help them to grow during the winter months, and they will be able to help themselves through the balance of the year. Do not allow them to occupy the straw for bedding longer than a week at a time; burn up the old leaves and replace them with fresh bedding; this will prevent them from becoming lousy. A bed in an open lot, away from a shed of any kind, and where the rays of the sun can reach it, is preferable, except in severe weather. It will secure them from the dust that is sure to accumulate in a bed under shelter. Keep them clean and well provided with fresh water and plenty of food, and you will have no occasion to look for a receipt for hog cholera.

Family Fun.

Matching Flannel.

Into one of our large dry-goods stores entered a gentleman the other day, and with the air of one who had been used to this sort of thing all his life, you know, said to the astonished saleswoman: "Give me a yard of maroon-colored flannel to match a baby, please." Correcting himself, hastily, he began again: "I beg pardon; I mean a yard of flannel to match a maroon-colored baby—Hare," producing a bit of flannel from his vest pocket, "I want a yard of that."

—A little girl, whose father was a merchant tailor, said her mother—"Mother, I can always tell when ye makes a mistl, because he always gives you and me fits when he gets home."

—What have you been eating or drinking?" exclaimed his wife, as the husband returned at night. "Liquor-ish" he responded, and then he winked at himself in the dark and breathed thin till she got asleep.

—If a singer went down a cellar and sat on the hot furnace, would his voice come out clearly in the upper register?

—How is it that Wilkens and his wife never have a quarrel? Why, they've been married two and twenty years, and have never had a row." "Oh, that's a very simple matter; she is out the whole day washing, and he is a night watchman, and out all night."

—There is a man in Galveston who is everlastingly talking without saying anything. The other day Gilbooky met him: "I say, Mr. Talktative, do you know why you remind me of a river? He thought there was a compliment in store for him, and thought that it must be because something sparkling came out of his mouth. "No, my friend, it is because your mouth is a great deal bigger than your head."

—Considerate mother to governess. Miss "Smith, don't let Alfred and Jamie sit down on the damp grass, for fear they should catch cold. When they are tired you can sit down and take them on your lap."

—An exchange speaks of "a policeman, who shot a drunken man who tried to escape in the hind leg." The policeman is to be commended. When a drunken man tries to escape in the hind leg he deserves to be shot.

—A young wife remonstrated with her husband, a dissipated spendthrift, for his conduct. "Love," said he, "I am like the prodigal son, I shall reform by and by." "I will be like the prodigal son, too," she replied, "for I will arise and go to my father."

—It takes five gallons of whiskey to cure an elephant's cold, and since the fact came out seven New York men have been sent to insane asylums, as nothing can convince them that they are not elephants suffering with cold.

—Moriarity, who had been assaulted by Schmidt, appeared against him in a Police Court. "Did he have a provocation to strike you?" the Justice asked. "He may of have had something of the kind consaqhed about his person, but it was a brick he struck me wid," replied Moriarty.

—Sunday school teacher (reprovingly), "Boys, do you know what day this is?" Street boy: "Hi! fellers! here's a cove don't know what day this is! I guess he's been out all night!"

How to Establish Peasant Proprietary in Ireland.

Neither eloquence nor pictorial representation is half so strong or convincing as living example. A pious and edifying Christian in the midst of a community is worth a dozen of sermons. The force of example is effective in working changes in social and political as it is in religious life. The old heartless, crushing system of feudal tenure would have long ago disappeared in Ireland, if it were offset by the example of land owners sufficiently numerous, just, and humane to sacrifice to the claims of our common humanity what was offered in the altar of luxury, pomp, and too often of debauchery. If such an organization as the Land League were in existence at the time that the Land Estates Court was in full operation in Ireland, and if it possessed funds enough to purchase the greater portion of the property then embarrassed, and let it to industrious tenants, even with the privilege of the three F's, we would see little remains of the feudal system remaining now in the country. That old, unsuitable relic of a semi-civilized age would have gradually melted away before the sun of such an example.

Apropos of this idea of the power of example, we are glad to learn that the Rev. Chas. Lynch, pastor of St. Francis' church, North Adams, Mass., and President of the Land League at that place, has purchased an estate in county Carran, Ireland, which he will divide into small tracts and sublet to tenant farmers. This is a move essentially correct and progressive, and we hope that it will be followed as far as means and opportunity will allow. It is not probable now that an example forcibly effective can be established before the Gladstone Land Bill is in operation. But scarcely any one now believes that the coming bill will be either final or satisfactory. We will see in the land reform efforts of the English Ministry only the beginning of the end, and that end must be the complete eradication of feudalism from the soil which it has so long blighted. Every movement tending to that end should be encouraged by the Irish patriots, and certainly nothing can better elucidate and establish the principles of Mr. Parnell and his followers than the plan adopted by Father Lynch. Indeed, the sincere, active, and courageous part taken by the Irish and American hierarchy and clergy in the present Irish struggle for justice, is a most cheering omen of its success. Never before was their sympathy with a patriotic movement so outspoken, their act so practical, and their tone in the condemnation of the existing state of the Irish tenantry so decided. History will award them a high place in the gratitude of the nation when the principles they are so zealously abetting will have triumphed. We would like to see the four provinces honeycombed with little model territories such as Father Lynch will shortly have mapped out.

A Lunatic at the Vatican.

A curious incident occurred recently at the Vatican. An unknown Cardinal appeared in the Loggia of Raphael among the many persons gathered there on the occasion of the anniversary of Leo XIII.'s coronation. For a few moments he was supposed to be a foreign Cardinal whose appearance was unknown to the officials. It was, however, soon noticed that he wore a monstache, and that some of the accessories in his dress were incomplete, and on his being then questioned, it was found that the supposed Cardinal was a poor madman who had on several occasions presented himself at the Vatican asking to be received by the Pope. Having managed to pass the Swiss Guards, he had made his way, it is stated, equally unobserved, to the apartments of Cardinal Jacobini, where he changed his clothes for a suit of his Eminence's robes, and was proceeding tranquilly to take his place among the members of the Sacred College in the Sistine Chapel when he was discovered. He was removed quietly by the Guards, and taken to the asylum. Two petitions were found upon him—one addressed to Leo XIII., asking for the beatification of a certain Don Pietro, and the other to King Humbert, begging that a chapel might be erected to the newly beatified.

An Irish Story of Fifty Years Ago.

In 1831 Mr. John Scott Vandeleur, a landed proprietor of the county of Clare, let an estate, to a society which called itself the "Ballaghine Agricultural and Manufacturing Agricultural Association." The society practically comprised all the inhabitants of the township. Rent was paid to the freeholder, on a scale somewhat less than is common for land of the same quality in England. Except for this it was an experiment of peasant proprietorship combined with an attempt to realize some of the principles of Communism. The history of the experiment is a very interesting one. Anyone who cares to make himself acquainted with it may find it told at length by Mr. William Pare, in a work entitled "Co-operative Agricultural" (Longman, 1870), and will be amply repaid for his trouble. For the short period during which it was allowed to be carried on it was eminently successful. Peace and order reigned, and that in the midst of a country where at that period, as a writer of the times describes it, "the law has ceased to exist." There was no drunkenness, no quarrelling, no intolerance, though no lack of religious earnestness. Education was highly prized, and such means of culture as lectures, concerts, and the like eagerly used. There were economical defects in the system, doubtless, which must have shown themselves in time; but so far as the experiment went, it was a success and vastly increased the happiness of the people. Now for the moral of the story. Mr. Vandeleur, though a well-meaning man, with even a philanthropic turn of mind, had one deplorable weakness—he gambled. One night, accordingly, he lost Ballaghine and everything else that he had at play. The creditors stepped in; the estate was sold; the association, which had no lease, broken up; and Utopia vanished again into space. Ballaghine peasants, at least, had no reason to love the law which permitted, and even enforced, so enormous a wrong.

Parnell on the Arms Bill.

ARRAIGNMENT OF GLADSTONE.

The Land League and Fenians.

The Agitation Misrepresented No Coercion Acts for England.

The adjourned debate on the order for the second reading of the Bridge Preservation (Ireland) Bill was resumed in the House of Commons on March 4(Emmet's Day) by Mr. Parnell.

Mr. Parnell,

who was cheered on the Irish side on rising, said:

Sir—I take this opportunity of expressing my belief that the course which Her Majesty's Government has adopted in introducing and pressing to a conclusion coercive legislation for Ireland is one which will have lasting and permanent effects of a kind very different from that which they anticipated. [Hear, hear.] I cannot imagine anything that the most ardent Nationalist could do to make the breach wider between England and Ireland, and to conclude, eventually, to the disruption of the union between the two countries, worse than the course the Government has undertaken in forcing coercive legislation upon our country. And it is not alone the fact that you have introduced and persevered in this legislation, but it is the tone which has been adopted by every prominent Minister upon the Treasury bench. The tone and the manner and the proceedings which we have witnessed in this house from day to day, and from night to night, make it very evident that you have done more to create and preserve a chasm between England and Ireland than the action of all the American Fenians from New York to San Francisco. (Cheers from the Irish members.) I think it is an unlucky thing that the Chief Secretary should have had the carrying out of these measures of coercion. That fight here, number is slow to move, and when he went to Ireland he went as a Radical, and the member for a prominent Radical constituency. It was supposed that he would have carried some of his Radical traditions with him, but there were not wanting among permanent officials in the Chief Secretary's office, at Dublin Castle, men who openly boasted that, great Radical as he was, three months would not elapse before he became

THE VERITEST TOOL OF THE WHOLE LOT,

(a laugh), and certainly the change we have seen in the hands into which the carrying out of this coercive legislation has now fallen has not been a very happy one. As little wanting in the way of conciliation as is the right hon. gentleman, the Chief Secretary, certainly the Home Secretary has not been an improvement upon him. We have seen on three previous occasions that the right hon. gentleman is not very tolerant to members, but he has certainly reserved, for the carrying out of the bill, an exhibition that the most reckless of his opponents never expected to have seen from him. He has used words which were spoken by my hon. friend, the member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon), with all the skill of a practised orator, and he has put been ashamed to twist these words, and to hold up my hon. friend in this house as an assassin and a person who wishes to incite to assassination. [If you (addressing the Government) ever again have to carry a Coercion Bill for Ireland, I would at least recommend you to do it with some other instrument and some other Minister than the Home Secretary. I would recommend you to apply to the right hon. gentleman, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who, throughout these proceedings, has certainly not shown the same virulent animosity against Ireland that has distinguished one or two of the other Ministers. [Hear, hear.] We heard a character given to

MR. JOHN DEVOY,

By the Home Secretary [Harcourt.] We were informed that this gentleman had sent a threatening cablegram to the Home Secretary, threatening to stamp upon him. I was surprised when I heard of this telegram, and I was soon called from Paris to Mr. Devoy to know whether there was any truth in the statement, and I received back a message next day to say there was no truth in the information that he had sent any telegram threatening the right hon. gentleman, but he had simply used the same words which the right hon. gentleman had used in the house against the Fenian Society; and if the right hon. gentleman is entitled to say in this House that he will stamp upon the Fenian Society like a nest of vipers (cries of "Oh"), surely the Fenian Brotherhood are entitled to say in return that they will, if they can, stamp, not on the right hon. gentleman, the Home Secretary, but upon his Government. [Hear, hear, and cheers.] But the Home Secretary was not satisfied with perverting and misrepresenting the meaning of the cablegram, which he received from Mr. Devoy, but he tried to fix an additional stigma on the character of that gentleman. He spoke of him as a convict. Sir, I do not, in the first place, for Ireland, who have sacrificed more for what they believed to be the cause of their country, and have cheerfully faced the horrible punishment of penal servitude for their opinions, to be ashamed in this House as convicts. But look at the contrast between the Home Secretary and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, John Bright. (Cheers) That gentleman, in speaking of another convict, once a member of this House, the late Mr. J. Martin, my predecessor in the representation of Meath, did not speak of him as a convict, although Mr. Martin had been committed and sentenced to transportation for the same crime of treason-felony as Mr. Devoy. That gentleman coming up to Mr. Bright, asked to shake hands with him, for although he knew he was the enemy of his country he had never said an insulting thing about Ireland. You cannot say that of the Home Secretary. [Loud Irish cheers.] You cannot change the nature of the man—[cheers]—but if he would have imitated the high character of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, he might perhaps have conciliated natures instead of having so wantonly gone out of his way to insult and wound almost men, and those high-minded men, who have the widening of the chasm between England and Ireland, which most inevitably result from every occasion seen as this. But not satisfied with misrepresenting Mr. J. Devoy the very imprisoning speech two passages in the speech of my honorable friend, the member for Tipperary, in which he advises the people going to meetings to march thither, and subsequent passages in which he advises every man who has a rifle to keep it in his house, and then suggests from it that my honorable friend advises the Irish people to go out at night firing into people's houses. The right honorable gentleman took his head. He did then misrepresent my honorable friend. I know it is very hard for an Irish member to get himself right in this house, but I do not believe that gentlemen, even in this house, will believe that my honorable friend would do such a thing. [Cheers] Now, sir, I ask from the Home Secretary with this word. He throws doubt upon the courage of the Irish people; but I have him with the remark that it is not always those who go about flinging cowardice at others who are themselves the bravest.

THE LAND LEAGUE AND FENIANISM.

The Land League has been represented as akin to Fenianism. This I deny. I have the greatest respect for many Fenians. [Ministerial cheers.] I have the greatest respect for men who announce themselves publicly to be Fenians—who believe in the separation of England from Ireland by physical force, and who do not look to constitutional agitation. And I say the Ministry of today are doing their best to prove that those men are right; they are doing their best to thrust men like myself, the hon. member for Tipperary and many others, outside the lines of the Constitution. We did not oblige them. [Loud Irish cheers.] But though I have the respect for them, I have never been able to see that a physical force party was practicable or possible to adopt either in Ireland or out of it as regards the relations between the two countries. Therefore, I have always avoided connection with it. There are organizations of the Irish in America but the bulk of our money has not come from them, simply because they have their own organizations to support. They may have sent us money as individuals; but I deny that there is any connection, either open or secret, between the two organizations. We have been represented as advising the assassination of landlords; but I cannot help thinking that an unhappy passage in my friend the member for Tipperary's speech had been seized on by the Home Secretary, and has been twisted to suit his purpose. I cannot conceive that my hon. friend should have so committed himself as he undoubtedly did. Knowing, as I do, his natural disposition, and how his mind shrinks and revolts from any resource to physical force, he could not contemplate injuring the smallest creature much less one of his fellow-creatures, without the great repugnance. [Cheers.] I cannot understand how, in the heat of the moment, he wasled into the announcement which he made yesterday, that if he were at liberty to retract he would fire on his evictors, and defend his homestead. [Hear, hear.] I believe that he then friend meant that he would do it openly I believe he meant that he would not shoot from behind a hedge, but that he would fire at his evictors, face to face, and shoot them if he could, and be shot in return if he could not. [Cheers.] Although that is not a possible, a wise, or a prudent policy, although a recourse to such methods should not be recommended, and although, myself, could not for a moment to create such language, I should say there was NOTHING LIKE CONSPIRACY IN THAT.

[Cheers.] There was nothing mean or dishonorable in the announcement by hon. friend, and I for did he invite anybody else to imitate his example. [Cheers.] But if my hon. friend had been Professor Blackie, if he had said the words which Professor Blackie used a short time ago in addressing a public meeting in Scotland, then, indeed, he would have incurred the imputation which the Home Secretary endeavored to attach to him. [Cheers.] Professor Blackie, the other day, during a lecture delivered in the Literary Institute, Edinburg, said that at the time the Covenanters were restored to dominion in Ireland was in the same state that Ireland is now. There was no protection from the law, just as there is no protection from the law in Ireland, just as there is no protection from the law for the property of the Irish tenants, and nothing for the tenants themselves but starvation and death which the Prime Minister spoke of in the two threatenings against eleven thousand of the men, women and children of Ireland. [Hear, hear.]

Mr. Gladstone was understood to express his disent.

Mr. Parnell—If it was not a sentence of death by starvation, I don't see what it was.

Professor Blackie said: "We will declare war, partly open and partly in ambush, against the oppression." Then he referred to the case of shooting landlords in Ireland, and said he did not approve of the war of Parnell, or those who shot landlords from behind a hedge, but he did not do it in the spirit as Sharpe was pulled out of his carriage and murdered by the Covenanters. "Served him right." He firmly and completely sympathized with the murderers. It was

THE SAME SPIRIT OF NATURE,

And if the law was not the ministry of the God of Righteousness, but the ministry of the devil, he wanted to know why it should be called a sentiment because it leads to a rule contrary to what the law could and do." [Laughter.] My hon. friend, the member for Tipperary, went over to Ireland, and said what Professor Blackie said, he would be laid by the heels by the Chief Secretary, under the Coercion Act, and locked up in prison. [Ministerial cheers and counter cheers.] But my hon. friend had said any language of that kind, but the language he used has been deliberately twisted and perverted by the Home Secretary, for the purpose of blinding and misleading the Parliament, and, perhaps, the people. [Oh!] and cheers]. We have been told that the state of society in Ireland is desperate, and that the Government must have this bill to disarm the people. I tell you that you will not prevent a single murder by this bill. [Cheers.] You will scarcely deprive a single one of the assassin agents, and the "village assassinates" referred to by the Chief Secretary in a former debate of the power of shooting the landlord w he desires. You will not get at one of the Fenian guns, if there are any, and there are no Fenian guns in Ireland. You will not get at the shot guns of the farmers who have hidden a few of them. I may remark that the Government have not produced any statistics showing the number of such guns, but they were afraid, I suppose, that if they did so, the number would be so small, that this house would assist their bill. You will just take the arms from the farmers who have bought old fowling pieces for the purpose of shooting hares and rabbits under the Ground Game Bill. [Laughter and cheers.] You will take from them the power of carrying out the law, which the right hon. gentleman assertions announced would be assisted in England, and Scotland, and Ireland. It will also enable every policeman, and every Land Leaguer, to look to seize anybody, man, woman or child, in the darkness, or the twilight, or the broad daylight, or anywhere else, except in their own houses, where they can find them, and will still enable them to search those persons. There's a little promise for you. [Ironical cheers.] We have heard that the Government quite believes in the Irish magistrates, but there will be the power to search every man, woman, and child in Ireland, if they please.

THE TRUTH ABOUT IRELAND.

But what are the facts with regard to the state of Ireland? So far from boasting, or crowing, having increased, they are actually below the average. In 90 the number of homicides and murders is actually below the average of the last ten years. [Cheers] The Prime Minister told us that crime dogged the steps of the land meetings, and he therefore sought to create a great case against the Land League on that ground. I tell the Prime Minister back that

CRIME DOGS THE FOOTSTEPS OF THE EVICTORS.

And if you want to put a stop to crime you must put a stop to evictions. [Cheers.] You will not succeed by this bill in protecting landlords who violate every feeling of justice and mercy. You will not prevent outraged tenants from shooting their landlords. The bill will increase the number of murders and outrage in Ireland, and it will also increase, as unhappily we have already seen, evidently, the number of evictions. Wherever we heard that the landlords were thinking upon the tenants, there we decided to hold our meetings, and the crimes would have taken place whether we held our meetings or not. [Hear, hear.] Now, a great deal has been said about Land League courts with a view to support the contention that the ordinary law of the land has been overridden. Sir, I regret exceedingly, as I regret many incidents in the Land League struggle—I regret exceedingly the institution of those Land League courts. They were instituted in certain counties—Clare, for instance —in which were very little under the control of the central executive of the Land League in Dublin; and immediately we heard of them we found they were objectionable to the Government, and it is very right that they should be objectionable to the Government, as they were to us, because many of their proceedings were flagrant in the extreme—but directly our attention was called to the holding of these courts we issued directions that they should cease. But upon what ground do you say the ordinary law of the land has been overridden? It is only the ordinary law of the land so far as it is used for the maintenance of landlords. [Cheers.] But the law of the land, as regards ordinary purposes, is supported better in Ireland, according to the estimate of the Chief Secretary, than it is in England and Scotland. It is only where a tenant is unjustly evicted, it is only where an agrarian crime is committed in connection with that unjust eviction, that the police opinion which I once called

THE UNWRITTEN LAW OF THE LAND—

A phrase that has been made so much use of—it is only where that occurs that the public opinion of the neighborhood comes to the rescue, and undoubtedly it does defeat the administration of the law. I admit that; and I say it is right that public opinion, legitimately expressed, and by violence or by agrarian crime, should be entitled to defeat the ordinary law of the land under these circumstances, and that the Government should not be allowed under cover to come to the rescue of the landlords, and by force and coercion to attempt to put down the public opinion of the country. [Cheers.] But would any man in his senses, except a liberal Government driven to madness by the party have recourse to such an office—would any man in his senses refuse to listen to such teaching? If there is injustice, it follows that the people will resist injustice. You cannot prevent them and if you want to have your law obeyed, surely the proper way is to MAKE THAT LAW JUST FIRST.

You have in the course of this debate, you have entered upon a policy of repression and intimidation in order to secure obedience to law which the Prime Minister confessed last year was insufficient to inflict punishment on the people. Instead of bringing forward your measures of conciliation, you have brought forward your measures of repression, and you may, perhaps, in the course of a few weeks, be up to your elbows in the blood of innocent persons in your attempt to uphold an infamous and unjust territorial system in Ireland. Reference has been made to trades unions, and we have been told that if the Land League has like the trades unions there would be no objection to the Land League, but outside of other, it appears, that when political movements are started at first they are always subject to the same kind of criticism, which we have to meet now. They are always told that they are aliens and abettors of assassination. The Prime Minister made a bid to the trades unions of England when he said they never supported assassination. We never said that they did, and we say also that the Land League never supported assassination.

Mr. Gladstone. Hear, hear.

Mr. Parnell—Well, illegality; we do not say that trades unions ever did support illegality, and we also say that the Land League never did support illegality. [Laughter and cheers.] The only illegality that the Land League ever supported is in the advice given to tenants to break their yearly contracts. These contracts are not contracts. [Hear, hear.] They were a legal fiction, and they have been confirmed by the report of your own Royal Commission, which declared that freedom of contract does not exist in Ireland. [Hear, hear.]

WHERE MONEY IS THE LAND QUESTION

Was it not for this Irish National Land League, [Cheers.], who were now to be hunted like vermin out of their own country, where would the land question be? I had the honor of sitting in this House during the last Parliament, and I watched from time to time the late hon. and learned member for the city of Limerick bringing forward his land bill with all the skill and genius which so eminently distinguished him. I also watched the majority of the right hon. gentlemen, who now sit on that bench, and who now are about to bring forward a bill of the very same character, go into the lobbies against it. [Conservative cheers.] One right hon. gentleman only, of the whole line shakes his head—it is the right hon. gentleman, the Vice President of the Council, and he certainly does form the exception, with one or two other very honorable exceptions. I wish to give him the full credit of the generous and foresight which he exhibited on that occasion, which certainly should have entitled him to a higher post than the office he holds in Ireland. [I ofdy you to describe outrages in stronger language than was used by Grattan, Curran, Flood in England, too, in condemning trade unions, just as the subject in Ireland to day are talking of the Land League. [Hear, hear.] You had every sort of liberality, you had every sort of obstacle thrown into houses with the intention of destroying life. We had not. [Cheers from the Irish members.] We had

NOT GOT SO FAR AS THAT YET

In Ireland. In spite of the denunciation of the Home Secretary as to the difficulty of prosecuting convictions you would not trust juries. Prisoners were acquitted in most serious cases, and in one case, I suppose it was that of an employer, the jury, contrary to the instructions of the learned judge, insisted in bringing in a verdict of guilty. Here is one Minister in the House of Lords attributing crime and outrage to Ministers who are not here, and another in the House of Commons, the distinguished Minister at the head of her Majesty's Government, says trades unionism has never been guilty of any such acts. [Hear.] O'Connell's agitation, sir, was condemned in the same way. He was called the instigator to assassination, and all the other beautiful epithets that have been always in use. It happened unfortunately that he was an old man. [Irish cheers.] He was an old man, and so the Government by imprisoning broke him down, but I am happy to say that the next who are engaged in the present movement are young, and after the 18 months imposition of the Habeas Corpus Act is over we shall be in as good a position as we were before

TO RESUME OUR WORK, AND TO PRESS IT TO AN SUCCESSFUL END

[Irish cheers]—that is, as we see it at present. Of course I do not know what your intentions are with respect to the Land Bill. I may say this, Mr. Speaker, that a political action in every country is a political action, and those and accused of horrible crimes by the classes against whom that agitation is directed. That is so everywhere. But it is far more easy in the case of Ireland for people to form an impression of a respectable movement than it would be with a respectable movement in your own country. When hon. gentlemen remember that our own local trades unions have been tortured at the time when public opinion said so what was going on; when they reflect how much intelligence they ought to possess, and how the nation in Ireland—how very much more difficult it is for the public opinion of the Irish people to assert itself—how very much more difficult it is for us to bring home to people in the face of gagging rules, the imposition of the Speaker, and the other authorities from which have been introduced in this House, you will see that there is little ground for boasting, for greater every thing that is told you, with regard to the Irish National Land League and Irish agitators. [Hear, hear.] But, at least, if you resort to it, I do not think that we—I do not think that the Irish people will, in the long run, be the sufferers. [Irish cheers.] If you think the Irish people will be the sufferers you make a mistake. Ever since I have been here you should maintain the link between the two countries. It is of importance to you to conciliate the feelings of the Irish people. It is of importance that your Government should not be known to history and remembered in Ireland as the Government of importance that the Irish people should act best your true interests, and not the petty tyranny and police, a rule of magisterial oppression, as a rule of suspicion and of war. It is of importance, from your point of view, that this should be so. It is of importance to the more you tyrannize—the more you trifle with the Irish people—the more you will burn the spirit of nationality [Irish cheers], the more they will free themselves from the yoke which renders such things possible. We may fare our day—our short day of persecution. I believe the public opinion of the people of England will, sooner day or other, do justice to our motives, even if they do not approve our course. [Irish cheers.]

When hon. gentlemen remember that our own local trades unions have been tortured at the time when public opinion said so what was going on; when they reflect how much more difficult it is for the public opinion of the Irish people to assert itself—how very much more difficult it is for us to bring home to people in the face of gagging rules, the imposition of the Speaker, and the other authorities from which have been introduced in this House, you will see that there is little ground for boasting, for greater every thing that is told you, with regard to the Irish National Land League and Irish agitators. [Hear, hear.] But, at least, if you resort to it, I do not think that we—I do not think that the Irish people will, in the long run, be the sufferers. [Irish cheers.] If you think the Irish people will be the sufferers you make a mistake. Ever since I have been here you should maintain the link between the two countries. It is of importance to you to conciliate the feelings of the Irish people. It is of importance that your Government should not be known to history and remembered in Ireland as the Government of importance that the Irish people should act best your true interests, and not the petty tyranny and police, a rule of magisterial oppression, as a rule of suspicion and of war. It is of importance, from your point of view, that this should be so. It is of importance to the more you tyrannize—the more you trifle with the Irish people—the more you will burn the spirit of nationality [Irish cheers], the more they will free themselves from the yoke which renders such things possible. We may fare our day—our short day of persecution. I believe the public opinion of the people of England will, sooner day or other, do justice to our motives, even if they do not approve our course. [Irish cheers.]

Poetry.

FOR THE MONITOR.

IRELAND, 1881.

Today I would tell you a story:
A story of sorrow and tears;
I would tell you of a dear land whose glory
Has been shadowed for hundreds of years.
I would tell of a land fair and fertile,
Whose valleys are emerald green,
Where men and where lakes are the bluest
And clearest that ever were seen.

I would tell of a people heroic
Of men who are strong to endure—
Of women—fair maidens and mothers
Who share in the troubles of yore.
But the clutch of the tyrant is on thy
Her bravest, like outlaws, are hunted,
And man, driven desperate by wrongs
Oppress and enslave this fair land.

Oh! children of suffering Erin,
Who dwell in this home of the free,
Can you list to the moans of your kindred,
Who groan in the land of their sires?
Can you see their despairing and wrecked
Cast out on the roadside to die,
While thousands glut over their torments,
And mock at their heart-broken cry?

Oh, motherland! fairest and dearest—
Of all the earth's beautiful lands—
How long! oh, how long shall the tyrant
Dispoil thee and letter thy hands?
Oh, God! Thou art just—Thou art gracious—
Give ear to Thy people, O God!
Let Thy justice overtake the oppressor,
And deliver Thy faithful the rod.

NEVER MIND WHAT "THEY" SAY.

BY MRS. M. A. BIDDER.

Don't worry and fret
About what people think
Of your ways of your means—
Of your food or your drink.
If you know you are doing
Your best every day,
With the right in your side,
Never mind what "they" say.

Lay out in the morning
Your plans for each hour,
And never forget
That old "time is a power."
This also remember,
Mong truths old and new—
The world is too busy
To think much of you.

Then garner the minutes
That make up the hours,
And plough in your pilgrimage
Honor's bright furrows.
Should grumblers assure you
Your course will not pay,
With conscience at rest,
Never mind what "they" say.

Too many have loitered
Until the ship tide,
While seeking opinions
From those at their side.
Too many good opportunities
Have chosen to sink,
Because they are startled
To "what people think."

Thus let us, forgetting
The insensate throng,
That justies us daily
While marshalled along;
Press onward and upward,
And make no delay—
And though people talk,
Never mind what "they" say.

Kate Connor.

"Trust me, your lordship's opinion is unfounded," said the Lady Helen Graves; and as she spoke girl entered the room, her face brightened and her cheek flushed with greater feeling than high-born fashionables generally deem necessary.

"Indeed!" exclaimed the earl, looking up at the animated features of his goddaughter; "and how comes my pretty Helen to know aught of the matter? Methinks she has learned more than her mysteries of harp and lute, or the soft tones of the Italian and Spanish tongues; come," he continued, "sit down on this soft ottoman and prove the negative to my assertion—that the Irish act only from impulse, not from principle."

"How long can an impulse last?" enquired the lady, who, like a good girl, did as she was bid—which woman, by the way, seldom do, unless they have a point to carry—and seated herself by her godfather's feet, in the very spot he wished, playfully resting her rosy cheek on her hand, as she enquired: "Tell me first how long an impulse can last?"

"It is only a momentary feeling, my love; although acting upon it may embitter a long life."

"But an impulse cannot last for a month, can it? Then I am quite safe, and now your lordship must listen to a true tale, and must suffer me to tell it in my own way, brogue and all; and, moreover, must have patience, love—aye, and respect, too; and whenever I see my sweet 'Kate Connor' I bless God that an aristocracy of virtue may be found in an Irish cabin.

"It was on one of the most chill of all November days, the streets and houses filled with fog, and the few stragglers in the square, in their dark clothes, looking like dirty demons in a smoky pantomime, that papa and myself, at that entre season of the year (Body is out of town, arrived here from Brighton; he had been summoned on business, and I preferred accompanying him to remaining on the Lettors alone.

"Not at home to anyone,' were the orders issued when we sat down to dinner. The cloth has been removed, and papa was occupied in looking over some papers; from his occasional frown, I fancied they were not of the most agreeable nature; at last I went to my harp and played one of the airs of my country, of which I knew he was particularly fond. He soon left his seat, and, leaning his forehead with much tenderness, said: 'That strain is too melancholy for me just now, Helen, for I have received newly pleasant news from my Irish agent.'

"I expressed my sincere sorrow at the circumstance, and ventured to make some enquiries as to the intelligence that had arrived.

"'I cannot understand it,' he said; 'when we resided there it was only from the papers that I heard of the dreadful murders, horrible outrages, and malicious burnings. All around us was peace and tranquility; my rents were as punctually paid as in England; for in both countries, I am a tenant—yes, and a good tenant too—may be sometimes in arrear. I made allowance for the national character of the people, and while I admired the contented and happy faces that smiled as joyously over potatoes and milk as if the board had been covered with a feast of venison, I endeavored to make them desire more, and then sought to attend them to me by supplying their new wants.

"'And, dear sir, you succeeded,' I said. 'Never were hearts more grateful, never were tears more sincere, than when we left them to the care of that disagreeable, ill-looking agent.'

"'Hold, Lady Mal-a-pert,' interrupted my father sternly. 'I selected Mr. O'Brien; you can know nothing as to his qualifications. I believe him to be an upright but, I fear, a stern man, and I apprehend he has been made the tool of a party.'

"'Dear papa, I wish you would again visit the old castle. A winter amongst my native mountains would afford me more pure gratification than the most successful season in London.'

"My father smiled and shook his head. 'The rents are now so difficult to collect that I fear—he paused; and then added sheerily: 'It is very extraordinary, often as I mention it to O'Brien, that I can receive no information as to the Connors. You have written frequently to your poor nurse, and she must have received the letters—I sent ever with my own, and have been acknowledged.'

"He had scarcely finished this sentence when we heard the porter in loud remonstrance with a female, who endeavored to force her way through the hall. I half opened the library door, where we were sitting, to ascertain the cause of the interruption.

"'Ah!' then, sure, ye wouldn't have the heart to turn a poor crayther from the door that's come such a way just to speaks tin words to his lordship's glory.' And doesn't tell me that my Lady Hilin will not see me.'

"It was enough; I knew the voice of my nurse's daughter, and would, I do think, have kissed her with all my heart; but she fell on her knees, and, clasping my hands firmly between hers, exclaimed, while the tears rolled down her cheeks, and sobs almost choked her utterance, 'Holy Mary! Thank God! 'Tis herself, sure, though so beautiful, and no ways proud: and I will have justice.' And then, in a subdued voice, she added: 'Praise to the Lord! he care nivir left me, and I could die contint this minute only for you, mother dear—yerself only—and—

"'Our powdered lawyer, I perceived, smiled and muttered when they saw Kate Connor seated that evening by my side, and my father opposite to us in his great arm chair, listening to the story that Kate had to unfold.

"'When ye's left us, we all said the winter was come in armest, and that the summer was gone far ever. Well, my lord, we strive to please the agent. Why not? Sure he was the master ye set over us; but it doesn't become the likes of me, nor wouldn't be manners, to turn my tongue agin him, and he made as good a junteman, to be sure, by yer lordship's notice, which the whole country knew he was not adore, either by birth or breeding. Well, my lady, sure if ye put a sod o' turf—saving yer presence—on a good shirt, it only a turf still, and he must ha' been child Nic's born child when yer honour's smile couldn't brighten him—and if the truth I'm telling, sir, no lie. First of all, the allowance to my mother was stopped for the damage the pig did to the new hedges; and then we were forced to give our best fowl as a compliment to Mr. O'Brien, because the great (and the mayrifest without a tooth?), they said, skinned the trees; then the priest (Father Lavery) and his nephew, Bernard, and so, out o' pity, Paddy Lafont's trim cap could not keep it within proper bounds—actuated probably, by former bad habits, came straying down her neck, and her mobile mouth was garnished with teeth which many a duchess would envy. She was sitting on a low seat, her crossed hands resting on her knees, and was going through her narrative in as straightforward a manner as could be expected, but my unfortunate question as to the identity of Barney put her out; face, forehead, neck, were crimsoned in instant. Papa turned away his head to smile, and I blushed from pure sympathy.

"'Barney—is Barney—Cassidy—my lady,' she replied at length, rolling up Lafont's flounce in hand to attend them to me by supplying their new wants.

"'And, dear sir, you succeeded,' I said. 'Never were hearts more grateful, never were tears more sincere, than when we left them to the care of that disagreeable, ill-looking agent.'

"'Hold, Lady Mal-a-pert,' interrupted my father sternly. 'I selected Mr. O'Brien; you can know nothing as to his qualifications. I believe him to be an upright but, I fear, a stern man, and I apprehend he has been made the tool of a party.'

"'Barney—is Barney—Cassidy—my lady,' she replied at length, rolling up Lafont's flounce in hand to attend them to me by supplying their new wants.

"'And of yours also, I suspect, Kate,' said my father.

"'We were neighbors, please your honorable lordship, and only natural we had a—a friendship.'

"'Love for each other,' said my lordly papa, for once condescending to banter.

"'It would be far from the lips of me to contradict yer honour' she stammered forth at length.

"'Go on with your story,' said I gravely.

"'I'm thinking, my lord and my lady, I left off in the snow. Oh! no: he was to come up with the car. Well, to be sure, he took us to his mother's house—and, och! my lady, but it's in the walls o' the poor cabins ye find hearts, not that I'm down-running the gentry, who, to be sure, know better manners; but it's a great blessing to the traveller to have a warm fire and dry lodging, and share of whatever's going, all for the love of God. Well, to be sure, they never looked to our property; and Barney thought to persuade me to make my mother his mother, and never bothered the magrum that had come to the family; and knowing his heart was set upon me, his mother did the same, and my own mother, poor soul, thinkin' wanted me settled. Well, they all cried, and washed it done off at once, and it was a sore trial that. Barney says I'd put his hand. Hould yer whaist, all of ye, for the Blessed Virgin's sake, and don't be mad entirely; and I seemed to gain strength, though my heart was bursting.

"'Look, says I,' but no matter. I know our honorable landlord had neither act nor part in it. How could he! And my mind imagines that my lady has often written to you, mother, for it isn't he to forget cold friends. But I'll tell ye what I'll do; there's nobody we know, barring his reverence and the schoolmaster, could tell the rights of it to his honor's glory upon paper; his reverence wouldn't meddle nor make in it, and the schoolmaster's a friend of the agint's; so you see, dears, I'll just go fair and easy off to London myself, an' see his lordship, an' make him sinsible; and before I could say my say they, all but Barney, set up such a scornful laugh at me as ever was heard.

"'She's mad,' says one; 'She's a fool,' says another; 'Where's the money to pay your expenses?' says a third. 'And how could ye find your way, that doesn't know a step o' the road, even to Dublin?

"'Well, I waited till they were all done, and then took the thing quietly. 'I don't think,' says I, 'there is either madness or folly in trying to get one's own again. As to the money, it's but little of that I want, for I've the use of my limbs and can walk, and it will go hard if one of ye's won't lend me a pound, or, may be, thirty shillings, and no one shall ever lose by Kate Connor, to the value of a brass farthing; and as to not knowing the road, sure I've a tongue in my head, and if I hadn't, the great lout that teaches the innocent swallows their way over the salt seas will do as much for a poor girl who puts all her trust in him.'

"'My heart's agintle,' said Barney; 'but she's in the right,' and then he wanted to persuade me to go before the priest with him; 'but, no,' says I, 'I'll never do that until I have justice. 'I'll never bring both shame and poverty to an honest boy's hearthstone.' I'll not be tiring your lordship any longer wid the sarvor and all that when I left them. They'd have forced me to take more than the thirty shillings. I don't know how they raised that same; but I thought it enough—and by the time I reached Dublin there was eight o' it gone—and in my way the rest lasted; and I was three days from the sea, in Liverpool. Oh! when I got a good piece of the way, my feet were sore and bleeding; and the dogs of the sweet cottages shut against me, thin I felt that I was in the land of the cowld-hearted stranger. Well, my lord, the hardest-hearted nation I had at all was when I was sitting crying by the roadside, for I was tired and hungry—and who of all the birds in the air drives up in a sort of cart but Mr. O'Hay, the great pig merchant from a mile beyant our place. Well, to be sure, it was he was surprised when he see me.

"'Come back with me, Kate honey,' said he: 'I'm going straight home, and I'll free your journey. Whin ye return, I'll let the boys ye know, have a nate little cabin I've got to let, for (he was pleased to say) you deserve it.'

"But I thought I'd persevere to the end; so what money he gave me brought me the rest of my journey; and if I hadn't much comfort by the way, sure I had hope, and that's God's own blessing to the sorrowful. And now I am asking justice in the name of the orphin and widow.'

"And now, my dear lord," continued the Lady Helen, "tell me, if a fair English maiden, with soft blue eyes and delicate accent, had thus suffered; if, driven from a beloved home, with a helpless parent, she had refused the hand of the man she loved, became she would not bring poverty to his dwelling; if she had undertaken a journey to a foreign land; suffered scorn and starvation; been tempted to return, but until her object was accomplished—until justice was done to her parent—resisted that temptation, would you say she acted from impulse or from principle?

"Ere she finished the off gentleman, as usual, was sound asleep in his arm chair; and 'that you are a saucy gipsy to catch me in a way.' Fine times, indeed, when a pretty lass of eighteen talks down a man of sixty! But tell me the result?

"Instead of returning to Brighton, my father, without appraising her worthy agent, in three days arranged for our visiting dear Ireland. We hired a carriage in Dublin, and just on the verge of papa's estate saw Mr. O'Brien, his hands in his pockets, his red red hair sticking out all round his dandy hat like a burning furze brush, and his vulgar, ugly face as dirty as if it had not been washed for a month. He was lording it over some half-naked creatures, who were breaking stones, but who, despite of his presence, ceased working as the carriage approached.

"'There's himself,' muttered Kate. We stopped, and I shall never forget the so called look of O'Brien when my father put his head out of the window. He could not utter a single sentence. Many of the poor men also recognized us, and, as we nodded and spoke to them, shouted so loudly for joy that the horses flinched on; not before, however, the triumphant Katherine exclaimed: 'And I'm here, Mr. O'Brien, in the same cosh wid my lord and lady, and now we'll have justice,' at which my father was very angry, and I was equally delighted.

"It was worth a king's ransom to see the happiness of the united families of the Connors and Cassidys; the gray cat even purred with satisfaction. Then such a wedding! Only fancy, my dear Lady Helen, a poor maid, dancing an Irish jig on an earthen floor. From what my father saw and heard he resolved to remain six months at the ancient castle of Castle Graves. You can scarcely imagine how well we got on. The people are sometimes a little obstinate in the matter of smoke, and as they love liberty themselves do not like to confine their pigs. But these are only trifles.

"I had my own school, on my own plan, which I will explain another time, and you will only tell you that it is visited by both clergymen and priests; and I only wish that all our absentees would follow our example, and then, my dear godpapa, the Irish would have good impulses and act upon right principles."

Stories of Andrew Jackson.

(Cincinnati Gazette.)

When Jackson was President, Jimmy O'Neil, the Irish doorkeeper of the White House, was a marked character. He had his foibles, which often offended the fastidiousness of the President's nephew and secretary, Major Donelson, who sought his dismissal on an average of about once a week. But on appealing to the higher Court the verdict was always reversed, for the good old General. Once, however, Jimmy was guilty of some flagrant offense, and being summoned before the President himself, was thus addressed: "Jimmy, I have borne with you for years in spite of all complaints, but this goes beyond my power of endurance." "And do you believe the story?" asked Jimmy. "Certainly," said the General. "I have just heard it from two Senators." "Faith," retorted Jimmy, "If I believed all that twenty Senators say about you, it's little I'd think you was fit to be President." "Pshaw, Jimmy," concluded the General, "clear out and look to your duty, but be more careful hereafter." Jimmy not only retained his place to the close of Jackson's Presidential term, but accompanied him back to the Hermitage, and was with him to the day of his death.

A FOREIGN VIEW OF AMERICAN LIFE.

"Ourselves As Others See Us."

A writer in the Fortnightly Review—"a chiel' who has been among us takin' notes," thus records his impressions:

Nowhere in the world do great corporations and even individual capitalists possess greater power than in the United States. And it is used in a manner which at times renders them specially obnoxious. We have only to look at such enterprises as the elevated railroads in New York to see how in one direction a ring of capitalists are enabled to ride roughshod over all private interests without compensation either to the people injured or to the municipality itself. These railroads running down the main arteries of the city are no doubt an enormous advantage to the business part of the population, but they render the lower districts of New York still more dark and miserable than they were before, they shake whole blocks of buildings to such an extent as to be almost unendurable, and the passing of trains in front of the first-floor windows has greatly injured the value of property. But there is no remedy whatever either for the poor or for the well-to-do. The promoters put matters right with the

and all the rest had to suffer and manage as best they might. This is one instance out of hundreds. The railway kings, when occasioned such a "scare" throughout America, were by no means without a cause. Here a great corporation treated its men without the slightest consideration. At first sympathy of many, perhaps even of the majority, of the well-to-do people in Pittsburgh, was with the strikers. Afterwards, when the rowdy part of the population took advantage of the original dispute to burn and pillage not only in Pittsburgh but in Baltimore and elsewhere, matters took a different turn. Yet, even as it was, an official report of the whole affair contains the observation that railway directors would learn from these circumstances not to treat their servants as if they were mere locomotives. The arbitrariness of the proceedings of some of the companies towards their own servants is indeed only equaled by the shameful way in which, whenever they can safely do so, they treat the public. As a result, there is a bitterness of feeling which may yet show itself in a still more awkward shape.

In the same way the housing of the working classes in the great eastern cities is infamously bad. New York is worse in this respect than London or Glasgow. Yet nothing whatever is done to remedy this evil, though the rents are exceedingly high. Where, too, there is no combination among the working-class every effort is made to decrease wages and increase the hours of work. In New York, as in London, attempt is made to relieve these poor people, and the operations of the "sweater" continue unchecked. During a period of depression these and other drawbacks to the social system in large towns force themselves into prominence, and the socialist organizations in Pittsburgh and Philadelphia, as well as in New York, Chicago, and St. Louis, gained ground rapidly between 1875 and 1878. At the same time the increase of tramps was so extraordinary—there were no fewer than 3,000,000 of such wayfarers at the worst period—that all the most stringent, I had almost said ferocious, enactments against vagrants to be found in our statute book were revived and put in force. In some States they are the law to-day. Thus, below the surface of American politics are grave difficulties, and such a party as that which sprang up in favor of the rights of labor would have something to say for itself if organized aright and on sound principles. Now, however, that a general rebound of prosperity has come, these troubles are forgotten; the workingmen earning good wages are contented, the question of good dwellings is left to a more convenient season, and all that is to be thought of is the universal "boom." When the reaction comes again, it may come, it is to be feared, with redoubled force, and America of the future will be no more able than the present to make its numerous and all-powerful corporations pay their share of the burdens of the State. Similar tricks have been played elsewhere.

Nor must it be forgotten that enormous tracts of land were granted to local speculators, who, to use an expressive Australian phrase, "picked out the eyes of the country," and held on for a high price, refusing to let or lease or to sell at a reasonable figure. These lands thus taken were let off at a low taxation by friends of the purchasers in the legislature.

Modes of Dying.

Augustus Cæsar chose to die in a standing position, and was careful in arranging his person and dress for the occasion. Julius Cæsar, when slain by the conspirators in the capitol, consoled his face beneath the folds of his toga, so that his enemies might not see the death pang upon his countenance. Siward, earl of Northumberland, when at the point of death, ordered his bed and put on his armor, saying: "It becomes not a man to die like a beast." Maria Louisa, of Austria, a short time before she left her bed, had fallen into an apparent slight slumber, and one of the ladies in attendance remarked that her majesty seemed to be asleep. "No," replied she, "I could sleep if I could indulge repose, but I am sensible of the near approach of death, and I would not allow myself to be surprised by him, in my weakness. Let my bed be made with awake." Lord Nelson, on receiving the fatal shot, said to Captain Hardy: "They have done for me at last, Hardy, my backbone is shot through," and had the presence of mind, while being carried below, to take out his handkerchief and cover his face and stars, to be concealed from the gaze of the crew. And last of all, the great Bonaparte died in his field marshal's uniform and boots, which he had ordered to be put on a short time previous to his dissolution.

A REMARKABLE DEATH.

A Woman Deliberately Starving Herself, and Her Relatives Coolly Watching the Process.

The telegraph announced what has for some weeks been daily expected, the death of Miss Hattie Dunell, the "Iowa fasting woman." For many days, recently, a bulletin of her condition has been telegraphed to all parts of the country, and much interest has been aroused in the case, which is the most singular on record, the unfortunate woman having for nearly seven weeks been committing deliberate suicide, under the daily observation of her own sister and other relatives, who appear to have permitted the sacrifice to proceed without making a single determined effort to prevent it. Our readers will no doubt be interested in a brief history of the case. Miss Dunell was a maiden lady, fifty-two years of age, and lived in the family of her brother-in-law, Dr. H. H. Aylsworth, at Iowa city. She has been an invalid for many years. Neuralgia and nervous troubles made her life one of almost ceaseless pain, to obtain deliverance from which she adopted the stoic resolution of starving herself to death. She is said to have been a woman of remarkable willpower as the history of her self-imposed fast shows. Although for several years past her conduct was in many ways peculiar, there was no reason to suppose that she was insane. A very strange feature in her case is the statement that from November, 1879, until Wednesday night, March 30th, no one had heard her voice, and that although her organs of speech were in no way affected. All communications with her relatives and friends she made by means of a slate.

HER STRANGE RESOLVE.

On the 23d of February last it was noticed that she ate no breakfast. This absenceee from food was repeated until her sister and brother-in-law remonstrated with her and endeavored to persuade her to take some sustenance. It was then that she made known her purpose of starving herself to death. She wrote on her slate: "I have no hope of recovery or relief, and am determined that I will die." Her relatives and friends, among them the Rev. Mr. Falson, of the Presbyterian Church, were called in. They used all their persuasive powers to induce her to renounce her suicidal determination, but to no purpose.

DETERMINATION OF HER FRIENDS.

At last it was proposed to force her to take nourishment, but those most intimate with her agreed that this course would only drive her to some other means of taking her life, and it was decided that it was best not to use force, in the hope that perhaps she would voluntarily alter her purpose. Never, too, there is no doubt, was a more determined suicide than this one. Her friends were allowed to see her, and she gradually wasted away, until she presented almost the appearance of a living skeleton. On March 28th she wrote on her slate: "Do you think it would prolong my life to drink cold water?" and presented the slate to Dr. Aylsworth. He told her that if she did not drink she would probably have fever and delirium, and that if she did drink herself not thinkin' would prolong her life. Thereupon she drank freely, and since then took a little water each day, but nothing else. She took water by sucking through a glass tube.

Towards the last she suffered but little pain, her pulse on the fortieth day being between 70 and 110, and her respiration normal. A little later on, however, her breathing fell to little more than 12, and her death, which had been hourly expected for more than a week, took place on the 11th of April, being the forty-eighth day of her self-imposed abstinence from food.

Mexican Society.

[From the New Orleans Democrat.]

There exists no other society on the planet, not even in India, where there is more distinction of caste than there is found in Mexico. On the Gulf coast, by consequence of unfortunate amalgamation of the white and the Indian and Chinese and the black races, there are said to exist at least a dozen organizations in the country of different colors, or, at least, of different characteristics. In the capital such is not the case. There are Castilians and creoles, or children of Indian mothers and Spanish fathers and full-blooded Indians. The creoles are noted for their intelligence, their symmetry of form and feature, and their personal courage. Their complexion may be said to resemble that of the far-famed cabaleros of Andalusia. The males are tall and shapely, while the ladies are generally very beautiful, are well-formed, possess delicately-moulded hands and feet, and the most beautiful eyes of any of the human family. The belles of the South of France, of the mountains and plains of Spain, of the sierras and coasts of Portugal and the famous cities of Italy, must yield to their charming sisters of the Latin republics in the beauty, shape, size and expression of the eyes. They are so exceedingly expressive that a glance from beneath their long fringes seems to melt into the very soul.

The Mexican ladies are exemplary wives and fond and loving mothers. Their home is their entire world, their husbands the idol of their hearts, while their children are the angels which makes their homes their heaven. Yet, strange to say, there is no word in the Spanish language that can express the idea conveyed in our dear old hearty Anglo-Saxon word "home." The nearest approach to it is found in hogar, which may be translated into "hearth-stone" or "hearth" simply.

CHARGE OF BOYCOTTING AGAINST A PRIEST.

At the Kilkenny Assizes recently, Rev. Michael Coly, C.C., Mullinavat, Robert Sheehy, John Purkin, Richard Connolly, John Grant, Michael Purcell, Thomas Duggan, John Costello, and James Feery were indicted for having, on the 14th of December, at Mullinavat, with unauthorizing, intimidated Darby Walsh, farmer, to give up to John Gaul a farm, or compensation for the loss of the said farm, he having a legal right to abstain from doing so. There was a second count against the prisoners for conspiracy. Mr. Ryan, in stating the case for the Crown, said the offence for which the prisoners were indicted was of a very serious character, and was against every public character. He regretted exceedingly that amongst the defendants was a gentleman—an ordained minister of religion. Referring to the offence, he said it was what was now generally known as "boycotting." He would rather that, personally, violence should not be urged against him, that he might have some chance of resenting than to be subject to this mean and abominable system of persecution; not to be allowed to carry on one's calling, not to be allowed to act according to one's mind. It appears that a farmer named Darby Walsh had a brother-in-law named John Gaul. Gaul held a farm from Dr. Stephens, and, in many ways peculiar, there was no reason to suppose that she was insane. A very strange feature in her case is the statement that from November, 1879, until Wednesday night, March 30th, no one had heard her voice, although her organs of speech were in no way affected. All communications with her relatives and friends she made by means of a slate.

Facts About Ireland.

"Why there is an Irish Land Question, is the title of a pamphlet of one hundred pages, by J. M. Healy, M. P., which has been published "for the Irish National Land League,' and which we commend to our readers for their immediate and careful perusal. The pamphlet, in the main, is a compilation—from trustworthy sources. The author says: "Amongst the chief history of the Irish Land Question to be briefed to the Counsel for the Defence," in this late State trials. It has been drawn up "in the briefest possible manner;" but contains a mass of information on the monstrous topic of which it treats, that can only be found elsewhere at great expense of time and with much labor. It may be added, that it contains a feature possessed by few pamphlets, namely, an index, which facilitates the reader or the student of Irish affairs.

One cause of the existence of an Irish Land Question is thus succinctly stated by Mr. Healy. After showing how the original Norman invaders became assimilated with the native population, in spite of some vain attempts by the English Parliament to check the process, he says

"But, it was not until the reign of Henry VIII. and Elizabeth that any general attempt was made, as a matter of State policy, to establish in Ireland English ways, English customs, English land tenures, in the places of those existing from time immemorial throughout this island. Before the introduction of the Saxon English system of tenure, the lands of Ireland belonged to the chiefs of the tribes. The chief, subject to certain privileges appurtenant to his retainacy, held only as trustee for the tribe; but, the English system, because unfortunately dispossessed, the rights of his people were in no wise affected. When, however, the comedians of Elizabeth's time came, to subjugate the entire island, and to substitute British for Brehon law throughout its whole extent, the people of Ireland suffered when defeated. Victory for the Elizabeth resulted in the dispossession and spoliation of the native, as well as of the chieftain who led them to battle. English adventurers, by the Queen's grace, obtained lordship and dominion over the conquered territory. And class ownership gave place to private property in land.

How was this change effected? In order to illustrate the state of Irish affairs in the reign of Elizabeth, Mr. Froude transcribes a letter from Malby, President of Connaught, written in 1576, from which we make the following, naive and candid extracts, somewhat abridged:

At Christmas I marched into their territory, with a little detachment to consume them with fire and sword, spoiling neither old nor young.

I entered their mountains. I burned all their corn, houses, and cabins, and committed to the sword all that could be found.

This was Shan Burke's country. Then I found Fitzpatrick's country. In this manner I assaulted a castle, where the garrison surrendered. I put them to the sword, every soul of my soldiers, by my direction. Thence I went on, spoiling and burning all before me. I left Dick a little castle and a few houses standing, which I gave to his mother. It was all done in cruelty, and I assure you I spared neither age nor infancy, sex nor religion. Thence I went to Ulstermen, my soldiers burning and spoiling all before them

THE MONITOR.

TWENTY FOURTH YEAR OF PUBLICATION.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

THURSDAY ..... APRIL 21.

The Coming Conflict Between Capital and Labor.

The "signs of the times" point with unerring certainty to the fact that the great political struggle of the future in this land will be between monopolies on one side and the producers, laboring classes, and all anti-monopolists on the other, and in that contest the Monitor will be found among the ranks of such journals as may have the courage to defend the interests of themasses against the unjust oppression of monopolies who "grind the face of the poor" in every instance where grasping greed can coerce the industrious classes of the land to contribute to swell the coffers of rich corporations.

On the second page of our present issue we print an article from an English periodical, which will show our readers the true state of the condition of serfdom to which they may be reduced in the future by the tyrannical operation of corporations aided by purchased legislation, which is controlled by Moneybags, Monopoly & Co., to the detriment of every farmer, merchant, manufacturer and mechanic throughout this coast. We ask our readers, therefore, to consider carefully the facts set forth by the writer in the Fortnightly Review, and to make up their minds to wrest the power from the hand of grasping greed, ere it is too late.

Ten years ago, Horace Greeley saw the danger which was coming to this country through the combination of railroad monopolies, and he then issued this note of warning to the labor classes of America:

> A dozen or so railroad magnates, summoned by message, met from time to time in one of our large cities. Next morning the telegraph wires will have flashed across the land their decisions that every bushel of grain going to market, every bale of goods passing inland, shall henceforth pay twenty to thirty per cent. more freight than has hitherto been paid. In fact, this body of railroad kings has arbitrarily reduced the value of every farm, every quarter section, every bushel of grain in the great West. If they owned the whole country, and all who live in it, they could not lord it over us more tyrannically. And perhaps they will proceed next day to make up a scrip dividend or additional issue of stock, representing nothing but their own rapacity, so as to conceal from mill or careless eyes the fact that they are exacting from their customers an annual profit of fifteen and twenty per cent. on their actual investment. I ask this State and every State to affirm and exercise the right of fixing proper and reasonable rates of fare and freight on every railroad, subject to their jurisdiction; that if the courts should in any case decide that the power thus claimed is not granted to legislators by existing constitutions, then I ask that such power be expressly conferred by constitutional amendment. There can be no doubt of the power of the people thus to improve the fundamental law; in fact, I can see no reason for doubt that the same power which sufficed to give the farmers' homes free of the encumbrance of mortgages, carries with it the right to use that railroad as a price likewise fixed by the State.

These memorable words have as much truth for their foundation at this day as they had when they were written, and time has but proved the sagacity of the mind from which they emanated. The plan proposed by Horace Greeley, relative to making the State the authority to regulate rates of freight, has been tried in this State, and has proved a broken reed to the people. The railroad magnates remain "masters of the situation," and the Railroad Commissioners seem to be merely "clay in the hands of the potter." No interest seems to be manifested for the welfare of the producer, whilst the cause of the company of Moneybags and Monopoly is advanced to such a degree as to make stockholders rich, whilst ranchmen, stockmen, and all the branches of agricultural industry, have to be ground down so as to pay tribute to the Railroad Czar. The intention of the lawmakers is thus thwarted by the cowardice or worse, action of the Commissioners, and, in the meantime, the cry goes up from every portion of the State—"We are ruined by the extravagant rates charged by the railroad companies."

During our recent visit to the Southern counties, we heard this complaint uttered by thousands of people, who seemed helpless in their bondage to the monopoly against which they vainly protested, and these frequent complaints determined us at once upon the line of action the MONITOR should pursue in this crisis. Nothing can be effected by any oppressed people so long as they attempt to fight their oppressors single-handed, and confine their opposition to lamentations made beneath their own roof. The opponents of monopoly must organize; they must agitate until the growing evil is demolished; they must employ the power of the press to convey to the reading public the wrongs under which they suffer, and then elect men to represent them that will be pledged to release the producing classes from the grip which monopoly has placed upon the throat of labor. This great work will take time and much trouble to accomplish, but if the people interested are true to themselves, they will ultimately succeed in making the railroad magnates their servants instead of their masters; they will have freight rates reduced so that the farmer's profit will go into his own pocket, instead of into the well-filled cash-box of Moneybags, Monopoly, & Co., and then every industry in the State will prosper with the well-to-do condition of the agricultural classes. In the achievement of this glorious work the MONITOR is determined to use its influence, and, in return, we ask the cheerful co-operation of every lover of justice right and equity throughout the State of California.

The State Orphans' Home, Nevada

The disgusting revelations published on our first page, concerning the management of the above institution, should convince the most bigoted and obtuse in our community that institutions for the care and education of helpless orphans should be in the hands of men and women who have neither personal gain nor selfish ends to promote. The heartless cruelty perpetrated upon boys and girls of tender age by the Superintendent and Matron of the State Orphan Asylum in Nevada, and the gross mismanagement of that institution in general, should arouse the people of that State to the necessity of an immediate change in its management.

Several children testified "they were required to write words five hundred or a thousand times; were locked up or whipped with a ruler or a rawhide. Little girls only nine years of age had been spanked in the presence of the boys, and the marks of the flogging on some had been seen ten days after it was administered.

This is absolutely shocking, and forcibly reminds one of the scenes so well described by Dickens, which took place in Dotheby's Hall, Yorkshire, under the administration of Mr. Mrs. and Miss Squeers. Like the orphans under the care of Mr. Squeers, those under Mr. Mills, in Nevada, have a waiksome for trying to keep away from the paternal care of their dear guardians and teachers.

From the evidence it appeared that many of the orphans tried to escape from the Institution, and when remonstrated with, had said they preferred to risk death from hunger and exposure, outside the walls, rather than submit to the treatment inflicted upon them at home. This is a sad commentary upon the humane and Christian manner in which the establishment was conducted. However, the Directors try to gloss the matter over, and say these charges against the officers are "highly colored and distorted," and that "they have unshaken confidence in those who at present have charge of the domestic government of the Home. The Directors do not specify in what particular line of character or duty in these officers, their confidence is placed. If they have confidence that they can wield the birch-rod in a most emphatic manner, they are correct; but if they have confidence that they can manage the Institution in accordance with the wishes and desires of the people of Nevada, we think they are not correct, or else we much mistake the temper of the citizens of the Silver State. The press demanded a fair, open, and above board investigation of the management of the Institution, and these Directors would not grant it. "There is something rotten in Denmark," or else why cloak it. Why has not Mr. Mills, the Superintendent, demanded a public investigation, if he desires to be exonerated from the charges made against him? If the Orphan Asylum is all that the Directors and officers claim for it, surely, an investigation will only bring out the truth, which, instead of doing harm, will only redound to their honor and credit. It looks as if these gentlemen were afraid "to face the music." The Virginia Chronicle says:

> Henceforth no one who is not supplied with the exclusive knowledge of the Directors can have the least confidence that the Orphans' Home, under the present management, is conducted with either humanity, decency or honesty.

Nor is this condition of affairs likely to be improved by a change of Superintendent and Matron. The new hands, Mr Smith and Mrs. Jones, or whoever else they may be, will soon fall into the grooves left vacant by their predecessors. What is wanted is a change of system. From our experience, and we have had considerable in such matters, we can tell the good people of Nevada that, stereotypy institutions such as theirs, can never work well or succeed, unless under the control and management of guardians, who, either through motives of charity or religion, are willing to assume parental responsibility over their charge.

Persons imbued by such motives, will take as tender care of orphans committed to their care as they would almost of their own offspring. As long as it is a question of dollars and cents, of how much they can make out of contracts for supplies to the Asylum, or out of other opportunities of stealing, so long will the people be bled by taxes, and the orphans by cowhides.

Though California cannot boast much of economy and good management in the conduct of her public institutions, she can certainly point with pride to her Orphan Asylums. They are always open to inspection, and we invite the law-makers and others concerned in our Sister State to pay them a visit. The Orphan Asylums are all admirably managed. The children are clean, well-fed, happy and contented. They receive not only a good common school education, but they are taught to fear God, to love their country and its institutions, to reverence what is good, and to shun what is evil. They become, generally, good citizens of the Republic. None have ever yet occupied a cell in the State prison. They respect their teachers and guardians—not hate, or try to escape from them. When the time of departure arrives, it is with feelings of sorrow they go from the walls of the asylum which to them was, in many ways, a home. In after life, many an American mother will look back with pleasure to the days of her childhood, and think of the holy and good advice given to her by the Sisters of Charity in the Orphan Asylum. And yet these institutions have their enemies here. Men like smooth and slippery Parson May, Assemblyman from the Tenth District, and ranting, roaring, Know-nothing Pixley, raise their hands in horror at the largeness of the appropriation for the Orphan Asylums. These men shout loud at this grant in California's State expenses, would swallow a camel, if it was in the interest of monopoly. Of course their throats are well greased for the camel to slide down. Such men would have the State of California, like that of Nevada, undertake the management and entire control of our Orphan Asylums.

And yet the expense in Nevada of maintaining the State Orphan Asylum is about $300 per capita, whilst in this State it is only $75 to $100. Besides, a vast outlay would be entailed in the erection of suitable buildings for the orphans. It would, indeed, be a sad day for the tax-payers, and a still sadder day for the orphans, if such a transfer should ever take place.

Archbishop Croke and the "Tablet."

In last week's MONITOR we printed the manly letter of Archbishop Croke of Cashel repudiating the London Tablet in consequence of its bitter hostility to the people of Ireland. We have, since, read the article which caused Archbishop Croke to refuse to receive that anti-Irish periodical any longer into his residence, and we are not astonished at the action of the beloved Archbishop of Cashel, as the article in question is the most unjust that could emanate from even an avowed enemy of the long-suffering Catholic people of Ireland.

When the Tablet asserts that there is danger of the Irish Catholic people losing their faith in consequence of the present Land League agitation, it evidently forgets that the true and tried Catholic Irish are loyal to Rome long before and long after the Catholicor of England had the light of their faith under the bushel of Protestantism and the Bull. England would have continued Protestant to the end of time were it not for the immigration of vast numbers of Irish Catholics into that land, and these zealots Celts it was who illumined the light of faith in the hearts of so many converts and luke-warm Catholics among the English people. It comes, therefore, with rather bad grace from the pro-English Tablet to accuse the ever-faithful Catholics of Ireland with defection to their faith, because they seek to wring from the English Government a code of land tenure founded upon the Christian principle of equal and exact justice to all men.

The Tablet says that the present agitation "is precisely the same issue that was before the Catholic people of Ireland in the last decade of the last century," but this assertion is not exactly correct, for the reason that a hundred years ago English Protestant Ascendency was the law of the realm in Ireland, and the Catholics of that country have agitated this monster of English oppression out of existence. The Catholics of Ireland have also succeeded in abolishing injustice since then, notwithstanding that the ranks of their English opponents were filled with Catholics who loved the Crown of England better than they loved the cause of their Irish co-religionists.

The Tablet should also remember that its English allies used to dig, imprison, exile, and even murder the people of Ireland, for no other reason than because they were Catholics. All this has been changed; not, however, through the exercise of English clemency, but by virtue of Irish agitation. In recent years English diplomacy has been directed toward depopulating Ireland by means of famine and forced emigration, yet the Tablet looked on serenely and saw the Catholics of Ireland crushed and exiled without once raising its voice in favor of a people whom it should have defended from the assaults of England. But the brave and loyal Catholic people thus persecuted, were "inore Irish," and their dispersion over the earth, or their decrease by famine, were matters of no moment to the pro-English Tablet.

We are glad to see that the action of Archbishop Croke has been followed by many other Bishops and clergymen in Ireland, and we hope the British organ will be thoroughly "Boycotted" by Irish Catholics everywhere.

Free Libraries and Flash Literature.

Free libraries are excellent institutions—if properly managed. Here in San Francisco, the tax-payers have to pay somewhere from $25,000 to $30,000 annually for the support of their Free Library. In other parts of the State, where they are established, they are proportionately as expensive. Few would grumble at the cost, if they accomplished the good designed and promised by the authors of the Legislative Act under which they were established.

The library in this city, we learn, has been fortunate in having a good Board of Directors, who have honestly and economically discharged their trust. There is an extensive collection of books, well arranged and catalogued, and a correspondingly large number of readers, who study either in the library reading rooms, or have the privilege of taking the books to their own homes.

So far, so good. But we would like to see its benefits extended. We would like to see branches established in other available parts of the city, where pleasant reading rooms would entice young men and women from idle and vicious street attractions. Public money, spent in this manner, would be far more profitably invested than in a vast collection of books, many of which will never be touched or asked for. The tendency here, as elsewhere, is to have a great library, not a practical or useful one. Now, these free libraries were designed to reach the masses—the poor and the laboring classes who could not afford to pay the dues demanded in other libraries.

In these branch reading rooms, only a limited number of useful, practical, and entertaining standard works would be required, and for use in the rooms only. If readers wanted other books, let them go to the main library. Under such conditions, the expense of maintaining those branches would be comparatively light, only one attendant being necessary.

We hope this matter will be agitated, and the Directors induced to try the experiment of establishing branch reading rooms. Another, and still more important matter, is the "hogwashing" of the trashy, flash, sensational style of literature from the shelves of the library. A great many grown boys and girls are diverted from useful studies by the highly injurious matter with which some of our libraries are flooded. The Devil has a monopoly of this poisonous stuff in many of our magazines and periodicals. We venture to say a large number of the readers on the rolls of the Free Library indulge altogether in this style of reading. Touch, a free library is more of a curse than a blessing. How many are daily led away from the ordinary safe and practicable course of making a living, by the examples of imaginary heroes who have earved out fortunes by impracticable or questionable methods! How many are led by the same fallacy, plunging from the paths of virtue into those of vice!

The newspapers are full of such examples. We read of boys who start off on some highway, or pirates expeditions, and, in a short space, it evidently forgets that the true and tried Catholic Irish were loyal to Rome long before and long after the Catholicor of England had the light of their faith under the bushel of Protestantism and the Bull. England would have continued Protestant to the end of time were it not for the immigration of vast numbers of Irish Catholics into that land, and these zealous Celts it was who illumined the light of faith in the hearts of so many converts and luke-warm Catholics among the English people. It comes, therefore, with rather bad grace from the pro-English Tablet to accuse the ever-faithful Catholics of Ireland with defection to their faith, because they seek to wring from the English Government a code of land tenure founded upon the Christian principle of equal and exact justice to all men.

The Tablet says that the present agitation "is precisely the same issue that was before the Catholic people of Ireland in the last decade of the last century," but this assertion is not exactly correct, for the reason that a hundred years ago English Protestant Ascendency was the law of the realm in Ireland, and the Catholics of that country have agitated this monster of English oppression out of existence. The Catholics of Ireland have also succeeded in abolishing injustice since then, notwithstanding that the ranks of their English opponents were filled with Catholics who loved the Crown of England better than they loved the cause of their Irish co-religionists.

The Tablet should also remember that its English allies used to dig, imprison, exile, and even murder the people of Ireland, for no other reason than because they were Catholics. All this has been changed; not, however, through the exercise of English clemency, but by virtue of Irish agitation. In recent years English diplomacy has been directed toward depopulating Ireland by means of famine and forced emigration, yet the Tablet looked on serenely and saw the Catholics of Ireland crushed and exiled without once raising its voice in favor of a people whom it should have defended from the assaults of England. But the brave and loyal Catholic people thus persecuted, were "more Irish," and their dispersion over the earth, or their decrease by famine, were matters of no moment to the pro-English Tablet.

We are glad to see that the action of Archbishop Croke has been followed by many other Bishops and clergymen in Ireland, and we hope the British organ will be thoroughly "Boycotted" by Irish Catholics everywhere.

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE

Santa Cruz and its Surroundings Sketch of an Early Catholic Mission The Powder Mills, and Other Matters of General Interest.

During my recent visit to the southern counties of the State, I passed a few days very pleasantly in the seaport city of Santa Cruz, where Father Adam, the pastor, and his zealous companion, Father Moreno, make me perfectly at home while enjoying their generous hospitality. There are few people in California better acquainted with the history of the early missions on this coast than Father Adam, as he has made it a real "labor of love" to rescue from the Spanish records, and to translate into English, all the incidents connected with the foundation of

THE MISSION OF SANTA CRUZ.

Was founded on the 25th of September, 1791, by Father Alonzo Salvatierra and Fabian Lopez, by whom the holy Cross was then elevated, for the first time, in that portion of the State. These pioneer missionaries lived for some time in rude huts constructed of branches of trees, plastered with mud, teaching, in the meantime, the truths of the gospel to the Indians by whom they were surrounded. On the 27th of February, 1793, the foundation was laid of the present edifice, which, though within a few years, stood like a sentinel of the Cross upon the shore of the bay of Monterey. At present, but a small portion of the primitive structure is standing, and Father Adam kindly accompanied me many visit thereto, pointing out the various interesting portions of the structure. The length of the original building was 112½ feet; the walls were nearly five feet thick; the church was 25 feet wide and nearly 30 feet high, but its construction, judging from the walls at present standing, was very imperfect, inasmuch as a portion 50 ft fell down after fifty years' existence, and in a few years thereafter, the front walls fell in, and this year the balance of this relic of the Christian religion on this coast will have to be removed, as its appearance is not in harmony with the surroundings. I was reverently uncovered in the sad and decaying ruins of this temple erected to the worship of God nearly a century ago! The good Franciscan Fathers who designed it and built it were not skilled in the mechanic arts, nor skilled in which to worship the Great Presence, have long since passed to their reward. Father Thomas Peña, and the four other Franciscan Fathers who built the church during the 1791, 1792, have gone to their eternal glory to that God in whose honor they erected this ruin. Indians and pioneers, artisans and soldiers, alike, have disappeared, and nothing remains to remind us of them, save these crumbling walls of what was once a Catholic church. Has consoling the thought, however, that the holy faith taught by these pioneer priests was precisely the same as that which is now taught by their successors in the same Church to this day. Churches may crumble to decay, missionaries may die, whole nations may pass away, kings, nobles, and republics may disappear from the map of the world, but the church founded by Almighty God endureth forever.

While these reflections were passing through my mind, I noticed in one corner of the enclosure a small black cross planted in the earth, and, upon asking why it was placed there, I was informed by Father Adam that beneath it rested the remains of

FATHER ANDRES QUINTANA,

Who was murdered by the Indians of this mission in 1812, and whose grave was accidentally discovered by Father Adam.

The adobe church has been supplanted by a neat frame church, which was dedicated in 1854. The building is 100 feet long, by 40 feet wide, and among its treasures of the sanctuary it possesses a crucifix of great value as a work of art. The figure on the cross is nearly life size, and the expression of the agonized countenance of our Blessed Redeemer is so true to life, that it strikes the believing beholder with more than ordinary awe and reverence. This wonderful work of carving was imported from Spain, and is the finest specimen of the carver's skill on the Pacific coast.

THE SITE OF THE CHURCH

And the Rector's residence is the most ideal in Santa Cruz. Standing near the church, in the well-kept garden adjacent thereto, a painter's eye would be charmed with the landscape which would open to his vision in one direction, and the magnificent stretch of blue sea which he could behold in a different quarter. The eye never tires gazing upon such a lovely and diversified prospects as that presented, and every visitor to Santa Cruz should participate in the pleasure afforded in gazing on this pleasing panorama.

Whilst in Santa Cruz I visited the Powder Works, where upwards of a hundred men and boys are employed in the manufacture of that useful and destructive compound. Guided by the Superintendent of one of the departments, I visited the shops where machinery is employed to make powder kegs, cans, and flasks, in an incredibly short time. I next visited the mixing and grinding houses, where I stepped cautiously on the planked floor, fearful that the very walls in my boots might emit a spark which would blow us all into eternity. But so careful are the employees, and so watchful is the Superintendent, that no accident of any magnitude has ever occurred in these works, and those who are employed therein feel themselves as safe from danger as artisans in any branch of industry. On my return I passed by extensive tannieries, lime and cement works, glue factories, and other industrial establishments whose products have made the name of Santa Cruz familiar in every portion of the coast, and which contribute greatly to make this beautiful city the home of so many prosperous merchants, mechanics and laborers.

Adjacent to the church in Santa Cruz is located a flourishing orphanage and boarding and day school for girls, conducted by the Sisters of Charity, who have a large number of orphans whom they are enabled partially to support by the revenue derived from their boarding and day school. In the absence of the Superior, one of the Sisters kindly introduced me into the several departments of study, the refectory and dormitories, and I was glad to find that the girls of Santa Cruz had been afforded such a splendid opportunity to receive the best boon on earth—sound Catholic education. A boys' school was formerly kept in a building adjacent to the church, but Father Adam was obliged to discontinue it for want of patronage. I hope that at any next visit Catholic boys may be sufficiently numerous to support a first-class school where Christianity will not be among the lost arts.

I regretted that I could not visit Adam and Hawe, and Messrs. Brody, Williams, and other friends whom I found in this pleasant locality. I was enabled to largely increase the number of MONITOR readers in that region, and when I took the stage for Watsonville, stopping long enough at Aptos to make the acquaintance of Mr. F. K. Walsh, proprietor of a hotel at this charming summer stopping place. In my next I will describe Watsonville and its surroundings.

Governor Perkins having sent to the Senate the name of John Martin as a candidate for the office of Port Warden of San Francisco, Frank Pixley, with his usual hatred of all men who are not the slaves of monopoly, makes a rabid attack on Mr. Martin, because he happens to be "an Irishman and a Catholic, as well as what Pixley calls "a Gorham man." We have no personal acquaintance with Mr. Martin, but from persons who have known him long and intimately we learn that he is a gentleman of the right stamp, as well as what Pixley calls "a Gorham man." We have no personal acquaintance with Mr. Martin, but from persons who have known him long and intimately we learn that he is a gentleman of the right stamp, as well as what honesty and capacity called for by the Lieutenant, test as to qualifications for political position, and, so far as his social standing is concerned, he is a gentleman whose antecedents will stand the twaighter as truth stands above falsehood. If Governor Perkins will nominate a gentleman Mr. Martin for every position so rapidly as they become vacant, he will entitle himself to the thanks of every citizen who desires to see the several departments of government administered honestly and economically.

Decisions of Roman Congregations.

The London Tablet of March 19th contains the following summary of decisions of Roman congregations:

A PRIVATE REVELATION.

The Sacred Congregation of the Council has refused to set aside a mixed marriage between James and Louisa Hill, which took place in New York, May 17, 1866. In the decision is that the contract of marriage is still binding, even though the Protestant party fail to keep the solemn promise made before marriage to allow the children to be brought up Catholics. Neither does the more doubtful about the baptism of the Protestant party affect the validity of the contract (S. Cong. C. March 30, 1869).

ERGATIUM SANSES.

The special indult granting to some convents permission to keep a Bespisem Mass on the days of the people which they have—one minute seems could seldom be used if minor doubles and semi doubles were included in the Ordinary of the Mass (Feb. 1, 1869).

Hence, in reply to the Prefect Apostolic of Shensiy and Holstem, the Sacred Congregation of Rites defines the only exceptions to be those of the 1st and 2 class, major doubles, and privileged octaves, privileged vigils, and privileged ferials. On all other days, therefore the indult is inadmissible.

THE UNIVERSITY OF BEYRUT.

The Sacred Congregation of the Propaganda by a recent decree, which has received the approbation of the Sovereign Pontiff, has raised the Jesuit College at Beyrut to the rank of a University, with power to confer degrees in Philosophy and Theology. A large number of nations attend the University, and a successful competition has been carried on against the Protestant American Missionary College there.

BISHOPS AT HIGH MASS IN MOZZETTA.

The Right Rev. Eugene O'Connell, Bishop of Grassvalley, U. S., asked the S. C. R., through the S. Cong. of Propaganda, if Bishops could be allowed to assist at High Mass on Sundays and festivals, in Rochet and Mozzetta. The S. C. R. answered that they could not (January 12, 1871).

—For many years the Abbe Hartman has officiated the onerous office of chaplain to the Hotel Dieu, of Paris. The appointment is made and determined by the Archbishop of that diocese. Should the stipend come from the treasury. But the other day the Abbe was curtly dismissed by the prefect, without any formal notice, and a letter of inquiry and remonstrance from the Archbishop did not obtain the courtesy of a response. And so the work goes on.

His Grace the Archbishop of Toronto, Ont., during his discourse on St. Patrick's Day, announced that he intended writing an elaborate work on the martyrs who suffered for the faith in Ireland, apropos of the present commendable movement for their canonization.

We print the programme in full in our Literary columns, and we hope the charitably generous patronage of our city readers.

INFIDELS ANSWERED

We are indebted to Michael Flood, Catholic publisher, 511 Market street, for a copy of a useful and interesting pamphlet, entitled, "Ask or Unanswered, being a Reply to Infidel Objections." The author, Father Lambert, is an Oblate Father, and, as well as what Pixley calls "a Gorham man." We have no personal acquaintance with Mr. Martin, but from persons who have known him long and intimately we learn that he is a gentleman of the right stamp, as well as what Pixley calls "a Gorham man." We have no personal acquaintance with Mr. Martin, but from persons who have known him long and intimately we learn that he is a gentleman of the right stamp, as well as what honesty and capacity called for by the Lieutenant, test as to qualifications for political position, and, so far as his social standing is concerned, he is a gentleman whose antecedents will stand the twaighter as truth stands above falsehood. If Governor Perkins will nominate a gentleman Mr. Martin for every position so rapidly as they become vacant, he will entitle himself to the thanks of every citizen who desires to see the several departments of government administered honestly and economically.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

THE CHURCH COMMUNION. The baptismal day of a Christian dated from the original Pentecost. Discourse, delivered on S. S. Cyr, by Richard Gibbons, D. D.

Ask or Unanswered, being a Reply to Infidel Objections, by Rev. Father Lambert, O. M. I. The work is by Rev. Henry Brown, D. D., who completely demolishes the infidel, Robert Dale Owen, and leaves no room for doubt that the same power which sufficed to give the farmers' homes free of the encumbrance of mortgages, carries with it the right to use that railroad at a price likewise fixed by the State.

LAND LEAGUE MEETING IN EAST OAKLAND.

A large and enthusiastic meeting was held by the Satsfield branch of Oakland, in the fine new hall, on Sunday evening last. Rev. Father Crowley, of the Oakland Catholic church, presided. Rev. Father Crowley, in a very eloquent address, spoke of the wrongs done to the sons and objected of the Land League. He was strongly in favor of the Land League, and opposed to the enforcement of the Land Bill, which would be fatal to the people, and would deprive the Protestant party of their property, and opposed to the enforcement of the Land Bill, which would be fatal to the people—both their temporal and eternal welfare. Rev. Father Wood followed Father Crowley, followed by Col. J. J. Tobin, who commented upon the "Gladstone's Land Bill, and stated his belief it would look upon the House of Lords. The proceedings were enlivened by songs and recitations, and a considerable sum was realized for the good cause.

CELEBRATION OF EASTER IN THE CHURCHES.

At St. Mary's Cathedral.

The Cathedral was the great center of attraction for the faithful on Easter Sunday. As usual, it was beautifully decorated, the many flowers and exotics breathing sweet perfume throughout the vast sanctuary. The Archbishop officiated at the High Mass, and Rev. Father Gillet preached an eloquent sermon on the Resurrection.

At St. Patrick's Church

Notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather St. Patrick's was crowded to the remotest entrance at grand High Mass. The church was elaborately decorated for the occasion, and all the surroundings seemed to bespeak the joyful festival that was celebrated. The high altar was tastefully dressed with pure white lilies, and an innumerable quantity of other beautiful flowers and evergreens. The tabernacle was bedeck in a bed of roses, and its miniature steeples were decorated with wreaths of evergreen leaves. Upon the altar were burning throughout the Mass 100 wax candles, which were so arranged that the effect was magnificent. To the right of the altar stood the burning Paschal candle, which was some feet in length and weighed 100 lbs. The Mass was celebrated by Rector of the church, Rev. P. J. Gray, was chief deacon of the Mass, Rev. P. J. Foley, Assistant Rector, Deacon; Rev. A. P. Sullivan, Assistant Rector, Subdeacon; Rev. D. J. Lynch, Master of Ceremonies. The Easter sermon was delivered by Rev. P. F. Cook, Rector being. "This is the day the Lord hath made; let us be glad and rejoice therein." Psalm cxvii, 24. During the mass the following well-known artists furnished the musical programme: Miss H. Brandle, soprano; Miss J. Bissell, alto; Mrs. Blake Alverson, second soprano; Signor E. Bianchi, tenor and leader of vocalists; F. Schoenfeld, bass. The selections consisted of "Vidi Aquam," Gounod; Kyrie Eleison, Mozart; "Ave Verum," Mrs. Blake Alverson; at the offertorium, "Alma Virgo," Gounod; Sanctus, Mozart; Agnus Dei, Mozart; "Benedictus," Gounod; "Ave Maria" and chorus, J. H. Dohrmann presided at the mammoth organ.

At St. Ignatius

At St. Ignatius' Church, on Hayes street, solemn High Mass was celebrated at 10½ o'clock a.m. The Celebrant was Rev. Father J. Prelato, assisted by the Rev. Father Caredo, Deacon; Rev. Father H. Legge, Sub-Deacon; and Rev. Daniel Crowley, Master of Ceremonies. The sermon on the feast was delivered after the reading of the first Gospel, by Rev. Father Parsons, President of the College. The musical portion of the services was under the direction of Professor John Muller, organist, and consisted of a composition by Maestro P. Giorza, offertory by John Lemmens, and "Laudate Pueri in D." The regular choir was augmented by the services of the following prominent vocalists: Soprano, Miss Nora Scrighelli and Misses Louise Lesser and Sarah Kelly; alto, Mrs. Henry Messe; A. Reuter and Bullock and Mrs. Fogarty; tenors, Messrs. J. McKenzie, Smith, Belcole and O. W. C. Nuttleff; bass, Messrs. Schmidt, Heider and Parrott. Solos were sung by Miss Lesser, Signor Scrighelli, and Messrs McKenzie and Schranz. The floral decorations of the altars were exceptionally handsome, and consisted of vases, baskets and stands filled with rare and beautiful flowers.

At St. John's Church

St. John's Church, on Eddy street, near Octavia, was crowded at grand High Mass on Sunday. The altar was profusely laden with Easter floral tributes, which were gracefully arranged by the ladies of the church. The Easter sermon was preached by Rev. Father Prendergast, of the Church. Rev. Father Mooney was the Celebrant of the Mass, Hayden's "Imperial Mass," Sola's "Veni Creator," and Lambillotte's "Regina Cœli," for the offertories, were sung by the regular choir—Miss M. J. Burns, soprano; Mrs. J. A. Cameron, alto; A. Leuttringer, tenor; C. Mengel, bass. Mrs. Virginia Nugent presided at the organ.

At St. Joseph's Church.

The services at St. Joseph's Church, on Tenth street, near Howard, began at 10:30 o'clock. Rev. Joseph Bessel officiated as Master of Ceremonies, Rev. Father Prendergast officiated as Celebrant, Rev. Father P. E. Lynch Deacon, and Rev. Father Wm. J. Quinn Sub Deacon. Mozart's Twelfth and Haydn's No. 2 mass were sung by a choir of 40 voices, organized, by Signor and Signora Frank Bianchi, Second Contralto, Miss Lizzie Bianchi, Mozart's Twelfth, the Veni Creator (first for soprano and basso), Sola's Veni Creator (for soprano), a transposition of Tozer's Veni Creator, Mozart's Ave Verum, Mozart's Ave Verum, and Haydn's Ave Verum. The choir consisted of the following: Soprano, Miss I. Mahoney, Mrs. C. Uhlic, Mrs. Dr. Bernard, Miss Lizzie Bianchi, Miss G. T. Evans, Mrs. R. P. Clement, Miss M. Bianchi, Miss Mary Bancroft, W. Bessel, J. Onesta, basses, Professor E. Pepin, L. J. Sullivan, tenors. The organ with which the Bessel celebrated vespers were sung by a large and selected choir, was presided over by Mr. Frank Bianchi, who played Lambillotte's Ave Verum, from the 112th psalm, 24th verse, "This is the day which the Lord hath made, let us be glad and rejoice therein."

AT the French Church.

An imposing sight greeted the worshippers at the French Church, Notre Dame Street, on Sunday. A rich profusion of exotics embowered the altars and lent a fragrance to the place. The forest forbidden of evergreens, relieved by bright flowers, and the altars, with their tapers, twinkled amongst the effect, and all combined, The altar was decorated in a manner which rarely have so much taste displayed. The decorating of the beautiful in church decoration was displayed to the fullest, pretty little place of worship.

CELEBRATION OF THE DAY IN OAKLAND.

The Church of the Immaculate Conception.

The services at this church were of a most impressive character. The church was most elegantly decorated with flowers and candles and the altars were literally covered in the profusion which prevailed on this occasion. The following was the programme rendered: Mass in F, Hayden's Imperial Mass, Mrs. Charles Morris, Miss Mitchell, Miss Zeigler, Miss Mary Morris, Miss Mitchell, Miss Zeigler, Miss Mary Morris, Mr. Charles Morris, Mr. J. J. Harrison, assisted by the following ladies and gentlemen: Miss Lizzie Farrar, Miss Ella Farrar, M. Masterson, Mr. J. M. Carrico, Mr. Rodgers, Mr. Wm. Carrico, Mr. Wm. Farrar, Mr. Wm. Farrar, Mr. Wm. Farrar

Farm and Home.

Farming Under the Sea.

Says the Boston Post: Everywhere upon the coast of Eastern New England may be found, ten feet below the water mark, the lichen known as carrageen—the "Irish moss" of commerce. It may be torn from the sunken rocks anywhere, and yet the little seaport of Situate is almost the only place in the country where it is gathered and cured. The village is the great centre of the moss business in the country, and the entire Union drags its supplies from these beaches. Long ago it was used in tilling the marine farm, and it does not take long to fill the many dories that await the lichen, torn from its salty rock bed. The husbands and fathers gather the moss from the sea, and the wives and daughters prepare it for the market. Soak it in water and it will melt away to a jelly. Boil it in milk and a delicious white and creamy blanc mange is the result. The annual product is from ten thousand to fifteen thousand barrels, and it brings fifty thousand dollars into the town, which sum is shared by one hundred and fifty families. Its consumption in the manufacture of lager beer is very large, and the entire beer interest of the country draws its supplies from the Situate beaches as the importation from Ireland has almost ceased. It is not generally known that the moss, as an article of food is called "sea moss farina."

Jamaica Rum Made from Old Shoes.

Speaking of the industry statistics, says a New York letter to the Springfield Union, reminds me that several curious businesses have been discovered by the census deputies, of which so far no newspaper has given an account. The superintendent of the Brooklyn census was much puzzled some weeks ago upon discovering that there was some tax made of old shoes, which was not known to any of the deputies in his employ, and could not be discovered. It was found that old shoes were collected in large quantities by ragpickers and junkmen, and sold to certain mysterious persons engaged in that business who were perfectly willing to have their workshop inspected. After much inquiry and investigation it was found that the old shoes were made into Jamaica rum. When they came from the ragpickers, the good pieces were cut out and sold to small cobblers for patching purposes. The rest was distilled with spirits, colored with burnt sugar and sold as Jamaica rum, and the most singular fact about the business is that it is bought not by saloonkeepers but by druggists who pride themselves on the purity of their articles. Many industries were found in which, though the value of the product was considerable, no value was attributed to the raw material. One man who made tomato catsup acknowledged to making $18,000 worth of catsup every year, but said that his raw material cost nothing. When pressed for an explanation, he sent to the factories where tomatoes are canned, big tubs, into which the peelings and trimmings of the tomatoes were thrown by the men who prepared them for canning. This material he got for the trouble of carrying it away. He ground it up, flavored it and sold it as catsup to the extent of $18,000 a year.

Family Fun.

Rat Sausages.

Pat Flannery is not only an efficient police officer, but something of a wag. Fond of a good joke, he never misses an opportunity of playing one. A few evenings since he was sitting on the Uncle Sam corner, fronting the lerver, when a long, lank Wabash deck-hand passed him, holding in one hand an area of ginger-bread and in the other a huge Bologna sausage. At almost every step he would satisfy the cravings of his stomach with a bite from each of the aforesaid articles. Pat no sooner saw him than he determined on a joke.

As the Hoosier passed Pat a rat across the sidewalk, at which he wickedly made a kick.

"Leave that rat alone," said Pat.

"Leave that rat alone!" repeated the Hoosier, looking at Pat with his mouth full of Bologna. "What do you want a feller to leave that rat alone for?"

Because it belongs to me, and I will not have it abused."

"Belongs to you! What on airth do you want with rats!"

"Make Bologna sausages out of them, and right nice ones they make, too."

The Hoosier waited to hear no more, but emptying his mouth of its contents, and flinging his Bologna as far as the strength of his arm could send it, hastened to the nearest groggery for a three-cent dram to, as he expressed it, "take the darned ratty taste out."

—"Drunk again, eh!" said the magistrate, contracting his brows and looking severely at the prisoner. "Yia, yer Honor," candidly returned Pat. "I was afther splittin' wood at yer Honor's house, and the leddy asked wud I take anthin'. 'I will,' says I, and I tuk two glasses, but if I had known yer Honor kept such bad liquor, pon me sowl, I wouldn't have tuk but wan."

—The man who exhibited the striped pig was the original hog colored.——If wrinkles are the graves of love, false teeth must be mosquitoes.——It is generally conceded that John Bull got the wrong pig by the ear when he tackled the Boers.——"Gracious wife, said a fond father, as he looked at his son William's torn trousers, "get that little Bill re-seated," and she replied, "Saw I will."

—A lady now residing in this city was once traveling by stage in the Catskill mountains, and stopping for the night at an out-of-the-way country inn. She was tired with her journey and slept late in the morning, not responding to the first call for breakfast. Presently there came another tap at her door and a gruffish voice said, "Please mum, won't you get up! We want to use one of your sheets for a tablecloth."

—Yesterday Gilbooly visited a fashionable tonsorial arena on Galveston avenue for the purpose of getting shaved. The razor was dull, and the barber had been at the Sons of Zion temperance meeting the previous night. The result was that several chips were sliced off Gilbooly's upper lip and there was an ugly cut made on his chin. "Can you give me a glass of water?" said Gilbooly. "Certainly, sir. Do you feel faint?" said the barber, as he handed the patient a shaving mug full of ice water. "No, no," replied Gilbooly, "I just want to find out if my mouth leaks."

POPE LEO XIII.

His Appearance and Distinguishing Traits.

M. Louis Teste, the author of several interesting books on the men and politics of the Vatican, has just produced another no less interesting volume. "Leon XIII et le Vatican." M. Teste, long before Cardinal Pecci's elevation to the Papacy, had designated him as the most eligible of the candidates for the succession to the venerable Pius IX.; the Cardinal's formidable claims had already been recognized by Antonelli, who kept him jealously away from Rome. The exigencies of the time demanded a skilled administrator, a man of moderation and of firmness and the two members of the Sacred College in whom these qualifications were most conspicuously apparent were Monsignors Pecci and Riario-Sforza, Archbishop of Naples. The latter was (whom Pius IX used to call his "right hand") was popularly regarded as the "coming" Pontiff but he had in his composition a vein of mysticism and obstinacy which M. Teste believed would cause the more calmer and more supple Archbishop of Perugia to be preferred to him. It is known that Cardinal Riario-Sforza, when the old Pope predicted his elevation from the attention shown him by the members of the Papal Court, declared that his hope was to die ere Pius IX passed away, and that he would not take upon his shoulders even if he lived and were elected, the affairs of the Holy See in the condition in which they would be left. The Cardinal's hope was realized—he died before Pius IX., and Monsignor Pecci proceeded to Rome to be recognized almost universally as the next wearer of the triple diadem. M. Teste tells us that his confidence in Monsignor Pecci's elevation dated from February 18, 1876, when he had a conversation with a distinguished nobleman, thoroughly versed in the affairs and sentiments of the Papal Court, who declared on his soul and conscience that the Archbishop of Perugia would carry off the prize.

EARLY LIFE.

Joachim Pecci, who under the style of Leo XIII. sways the scepter of the Catholic world, was born at Carpineto, March 2, 1810, the son of Domenique Ludovic Pecci, a Colonel in Napoleon's army, and of Anna Prosperi Buzzi. He was the youngest of five children; his brother Charles, born November 25, 1793, died recently; his brother Jean Baptiste, born October 26, 1802, and Joseph, born December 15, 1807, survived, and the latter is a Cardinal; his sister Catherine, born November 4, 1800, and married to Henri Loli, is also living, we believe. The family had its origin in Siena, and settling on the lordship of Frocena, in the environs of the city about 1250, soon acquired great influence, so that when Martin V took refuge at Siena he and his nephew Antonio found in the house of a member of the family hospitable shelter. The Pecci were ennobled by the Emperor Ferdinand I. with the title of Count of Montecarlo, and received a gift of 15,000 gold florins on the guaranty of the possession of the citadel of Spoleto. Not a few members of the family distinguished themselves in the various walks of life. One, a professor of civil and canonical law at the University of Sienna, represented the city at the coronation of Sigismund, who made him baron and Count Palatine; two became Bishops of Grosseto, and a third Bishop of Massa, and there founded a monastic order in Spain; several held high place in the order of St. John of Jerusalem, and two brothers during the last century were renowned—one as an archeologist, the other as an accomplished Hellenist. The branch from which the present Pope springs was established at Carpineto—about the year 1600, by Pascal Pecci, and soon attained to considerable influence in that place. It is a picturesque town, and its steeples and ruined fortress rising on the flanks of Mount Capreo give it a certain air of grandeur, but the streets are narrow, crooked and dirty, the dwellings of granite are filthy and dilapidated, and the people are poor and ragged. Nevertheless, the district has given to the Church distinguished men not a few—Saints Hormisdas, Silverious and Nitalian, Ignocent III, Gregory IX, Alexander IV, Boniface VIII, Antonelli and his "Gray Eminence" Bernardi. With the future Pope's education and early career our readers were made acquainted at the time of his elevation to the Papacy; they will be more interested in his personal appearance and daily life.

PERSONAL APPEARANCE.

He is tall and of ascetic thinness; his features remind one irresistibly of Voltaire's, though the expression of the face is more kindly without being less keen; his complexion is extremely pale. His movements are slow and dignified, and his address is simple and resolute. His voice somewhat nasal and drawling in familiar conversation, is sonorous and brilliant in oratory. In such private life as a Pope may be said to have he is simple, courteous, witty and amiable. M. Teste says that Louis Veuillot and Leon Lavedon have issued from his presence bearing away a gratifying sense of compliments paid them, but without being able to say, after the first moment of satisfaction, that the Pope was with the Ultramontanes or with the Liberals. Pius IX was expansive, warm, always in a hurry, and demanding hurling service, generous to magnificence—even to prodigality; Leo is thoughtful and reserved, dislikes any form of adulation, and in monetary affairs shows that he has not administered the business of a diocese down to its smallest details without learning a great deal. In the splendid ceremonies of the Church, his gentle grandeur compares favorably with the beaming magnificence of his predecessor. While Pius was an orator and took fire at the sight of an audience, Leo is, as a speaker, measured and reserved, and prefers the pen to the tongue. He is an accomplished Latinist as well as a master of Italian, and his style is worthy of study for its purity, simplicity, elevation and above all, for its convincing clearness. He has written verses not a few in both languages, and worships at the shrine of Dante, whose "Divine Comedy" he knows by heart. He is scrupulously careful in all points of literary style, and a rigid censor of the dispatches and documents of all the secretariats. His health is delicate, for he is subject to an intestinal complaint and a nervous affection, and in extremes of cold and heat he is loth to take the absolute rest prescribed for him by his physicians, Drs. Cecarelli and Valentini.

A LONG LIFE PREDICTED.

But though the Pope is delicate and by no means a docile patient, he has so much energy and vitality that a long life is confidently predicted for him. He rises at 6 and after his devotions celebrates mass in his own chapel, to which a few persons are admitted on Sundays. After mass he breakfasts very rapidly and lightly in his room—he is a great lover of chocolate, spiced and condensed—sometimes his brother is present, though it is not easy to lure the bookworm Cardinal from his shelves and desk. When the Pope desires to show a mark of especial favor to anyone he has a more abundant collation served in his library. It was thus that the Pope entertained the departing French Ambassador, M. de Gabriac, inviting also to the risco not the Marquis's wife and children, but signiors Macchi and Cataldi. After breakfast work is begun. At 9:30 Leo XIII receives the Cardinal Secretary of State, and the other officials of importance and such persons as are entitled to special audiences. On Mondays—and sometimes on Thursdays—he gives public audiences, for which, however, he has no predilection, as they exhaust him and consume time. He is especially averse to making addresses on all occasions, though he recognizes the disappointment that this must often cause the delegations of pilgrims that arrive from all parts of the Catholic world. Things were different under the reign of Pius IX, who, says M. Teste, conquered the affection of multitudes by his appreciation of the importance of little things—a word, a smile, a medal. There was always an enthusiastic competition for his skull-caps and the servants of the antechamber throve famously on the sale of slippers, stockings and fragments of his clothing.

When he has leisure in his public audiences it is noticed that he devotes himself particularly to the humblest and most timid of his visitors, and on a recent occasion he acted as guide, to a delegation of French journeymen printers, whom he showed all over his apartments, even to his bedroom. Pius IX was a great lover of the sight of the vast Papal Palace, and he added, with a merry twinkle in his eye, "Here I am the prisoner." It may be added, however, that he did the honors of his prison house with a merry grace and with a strong Italian accent and frequent inversions and slips. After a frugal dinner at 2:30 P. M. Leo XIII takes a nap of a quarter of an hour's duration, and after prayer and reading, resumes work till 5 o'clock, when he receives the bishops and the secretaries of the congregations. He listens with attention, even with curiosity, but never expresses surprise. These audiences concluded, he reads and writes till 10:30, when he should, but does not always sup. At 11 he retires. What exercise he takes is usually in the form of rapid walking in some of the great halls of the Vatican, though he occasionally appears in a sedan-chair through the gardens, and some of the alleys have been enlarged to allow of his being driven through them in a carriage, usually accompanied by a single cameriere and escorted at some distance by a small party of the Guardia Nobile. Even at such moments his Holiness is generally reading his breviary, perusing his dispatches, or discussing business with the prelate before him. If the weather is fine he sometimes leaves the vehicle for a walk. His step is firm and lively, and recalls his earlier hunting days at Carpineto, but the only sport in the gardens of the Vatican is netting larks and such small birds.

Johnny Skae.

HOW A ONCE-FAMOUS MILLIONAIRE IS GAINING A LIVING IN ARIZONA.

A little more than two years since Johnny Skae, whom everybody knows, would visit Carson several times a month, and as he passed down the street from the railroad depot, with an independent swagger and a more independent look in his eye, men would envitously gaze, after him and express their convictions that he would soon control by any single member of the Bonanza firm in the possession of millions. This was when Sierra Nevada and Union were selling at from $250 to $990 per share, and Skae was supposed to hold 50,000 shares of the shares of the stock of those two mines. At that period he would have had no difficulty in realizing $10,000,000 in cool, gold coin for his stock; but no, he was ambitious, and desired no longer to play second fiddle even to such a colossal financial power as the Bonanza firm. He fancied that prospective dividends of the Sierra Nevada and Union Consolidated mines would be greater than the aggregate of the California and Consolidated Virginia mines. Johnny was over sanguine; he imagined himself a one hundred millionaire, whose millions were safely deposited in the bowels of the earth. Of that he felt certain. In the meantime he entertained his friends in regal style. He invited them from San Francisco to participate in fish and champagne suppers, which were spread near the reservoir of the Virginia and Gold Hill Water Works, from which the luscious trout were taken, and in various other ways extended his hospitality to friends in such a manner that they privately called him "Prince John." In the midst of this, however, he did one prudent thing, and that was to settle $250,000 in bonds upon his wife. Believing that the stock of the mines in which he was so heavy a holder was sure to reach at least $1,000 per share, he hypothecated the same to the Nevada Bank, and purchased several thousand shares on a margin. Soon thereafter the market crashed, and it was not long before his stocks were quoted at fifty and sixty dollars per share. Of course that nearly ruined Skae; but, being a man of nerve, and desirous of retrieving his lost opportunity, he kept on dabbling in stocks, which at one time might have placed him in an enviably independent position, until he lost all that he had saved from the first blow, and it is even said that the $250,000 which he had settled upon his wife went the way of the rest. Now Johnny Skae is in Arizona, instead of living in luxury and superlative elegance, seeking a benanza, which he will probably never find. It is once in a lifetime that one man in a million is so enchantingly molded upon by fortune as Johnny Skae was two and a half years ago.

PARNELL'S SPEECH.

ORGANIZING A CAMPAIGN IN ENGLAND (hear, hear). We could not go then into the resources as we did lately during the passage of the Coercion Bill, and hold a half-dozen or a dozen public meetings in manufacturing centres throughout Great Britain, and we were not able to do this then (hear, hear). In the first place, our party was very small in the House of Commons—it consisted of the mystic number of seven (laughter). We have now something like forty (cheers). We had then no valuable resources; we have now our friends in America, who are pouring in money at the rate of three or four thousand pounds a week (cheers). All these figures point to a very great difference in the prospects of Irish agitation in England and the successful prosecution of our cause (hear, hear). The great mass of the English people, I feel convinced, do not desire to do any injustice to Ireland (hear, hear). Then, again, I was very much influenced by the advice and very strong recommendations which were given to me by my friend Michael Davitt (hear, hear). I can recollect the day before he was arrested and sent back to penal servitude, a conversation he held with me. He said to me, "I think we have made a great mistake in not cultivating the public opinion of the English working classes, and I hope you will take steps in England"—he was then returning to Ireland—"to hold meetings in the large English towns, and to instruct the working classes with regard to the merits of this Irish question." He was arrested the next day, and I have recollected that he told me that then, and kept it in my mind, and I think it was very important and very valuable advice (hear, hear). Now, the English land question is not ripe for settlement at present, but if we can instruct English working classes with regard to this question, we can show them that they are being made the tools of the territorial party in this country, and also in Ireland, for the purpose of collecting these seventeen millions a year in the shape of rents from Ireland. If we can show them that these operations and the collecting of unjust rents necessitates an annual payment from them of four millions of money at least for the purpose of maintaining forty thousand soldiers in Ireland; if we can show them that this is keeping the two countries permanently estranged—that it makes the Irishman hate the Englishman, and that it makes the Englishman almost hate the Irishman, no matter in what part of the world they meet (hear); and if we show them that the maintenance of such a system is a permanent disadvantage to the interests of the whole country, I believe that the present Irish Land system will be swept away before four or five years have gone by (cheers).

A Cardinal's Hat for Archbishop Croke.

Under date of the 16th ult. the Rome correspondent of the New York Tablet gives the following particulars regarding the forthcoming consistory:

At the approaching consistory there are some changes in contemplation in the Papal court. Among the new appointments may be mentioned Monsignor Ricci, the majordomo, who is to be elected cardinal. Monsignor Macchi is to receive the appointment of secretary of state. The Monsignor is but half sixty, and has yet to perform in years past, and it is said that as consistorial secretaries his services will be highly prized. The Pontiff intends to create no fewer than four cardinals, and rumor has it that they will be

ARCHBISHOP OF CASHEL

Most Rev. Dr. Croke, will be the next Irish prelate to receive the red hat. This appointment, it is needless to say, would be highly pleasing to the people of Ireland, especially in face of the fact that this illustrious prelate invariably takes the part of the people against their intriguing and relentless enemies. The feeling in his favor at the present time is more enthusiastic than ever, on account of the dignified and quiet rebuke he administered to a certain mitred friend of Dublin Castle in relation to the question raised about Ireland's charitable institutions and their action in behalf of their suffering brothers and sisters in the prescribed and down-trodden country. The line is drawn now, and it can be readily seen who are the genuine friends of the Irish people at home and abroad by the action taken in public matters affecting the welfare of the Emerald Isle as regards its either spiritual or temporal welfare. It is, therefore, to be hoped that of Ireland will not be forgotten at the Vatican, that their desires will not be overlooked in the next appointment to a cardinalate by their beloved country, for this people have suffered too much for the faith, they have been too devoted to the See of Peter for centuries, to be looked on as a mere secondary consideration in a matter so important as this. They will make no suggestion, they will ask no formal favors; but, if a second appointment like that of Cardinal Cullen be made, it may serve to weaken the faith of the Irish people to such an extent as to alarm the best and sincerest friends of the Church. If favors are constantly poured into a man's exchequer, it is not likely that that man will feel reconciled with the party who acts in such a way, but in all likelihood he will not rank him as a friend or continue to treat him as such, especially when he made generous sacrifices in his behalf hitherto. For the sake of the dear old land, then, it is to be hoped that in the appointment of the next some slight deference will be paid to the wishes of the Irish people, especially as the feeling is running very high just at the present moment.

THE LONG-SUFFERING PEOPLE

IRISH CARDINAL

Concerning Easter.

The falling of Easter Sunday on April 17th, this year, is considered late, and in nine days after the mean date, but it is to be remarked that in no year since the introduction of the Gregorian calendar into Italy—1582—has the festival occurred on the latest possible date, April 25th, though in two years, 1761 and 1818, it fell on March 25, which is the other limit. In 1886 Easter Sunday will fall on April 25th in the new or Gregorian style, for the first time since the year 1734, or eighteen years before this style was accepted in England. The only other occasion since the reformation of the calendar by Pope Gregory XIII. upon which Easter has fallen on the latest possible date, was in 1886, and after 1886, this will not occur again until 1943.

The custom of eating eggs at Easter has been traced up, not only to the theology of Egypt, but to the philosophy of the Persians, the Greeks, the Gauls, and the Germans, all of whom regarded the egg as an emblem of the universe, and the work of the Deity. "Easter," says Gebelin, "and New Years, have been marked by similar distinctions. Among the Romans the New Year is looked upon as the beginning of all things, and is noted for the triumph of the Sun of Nature, as Easter is with the Christians for the Son of Justice, the Saviour of the world, over death, by His resurrection. The early Christians of Mesopotamia, had the custom of dyeing and decorating eggs at Easter. They were stained red, in memory of the blood of Christ, shed at His crucifixion. The Church adopted the custom, and regarded the egg as the emblem of the resurrection, as is evidenced by the benediction of Pope Paul V., about 1610, which read thus: "Bless, O Lord! we beseech Thee, this Thy creature of eggs, that it may become a wholesome sustenance to Thy faithful servants, eating it in thankfulness to Thee on account of the resurrection of the Lord." Thus the custom has come down from ages lost in antiquity.

Railroad Freights.

The schedule of rates of freight on grain, wool, hides and cattle, prepared by the railroad companies, and submitted to the Railroad Commissioners last Saturday afternoon for approval, was this morning sent to Sacramento for printing. With regard to the reduction in freight therein made, the only information that can be obtained is that given by Commissioner Beerstecher, no copy of the rates having been retained in the Commissioners' office. Mr. Beerstecher says:

The present rate for the carriage of grain in carloads from Summer to San Francisco is $5.50; the rate fixed by the Board is $4.90, being a reduction of 60 cents. The rate to Port Costa is fixed at $4.40, the present rate being $5; the reduction is 60 cents. The present rate for the carriage of wheat from Hanford to San Francisco is $5.50, the Board rate $4.50. The present rate from Hanford to Port Costa is $5, the Board rate is $4, and proportionately all along the line of the Southern Pacific. The present rate for the carriage of wheat from The Willows to San Francisco is $5.25; the Board rate is $3. The present rate to Port Costa is $2.75, the Board rate is $2.50. The present rate from Chico to San Francisco is $5.50; the Board rate is $2.25. The present rate to Port Costa is $2; the Board rate is $1.75. The present rate from Delta to San Francisco is $2.85; the Board rate is $2.20. The present rate to Port Costa is $2.65; the Board rate is $2.10. The present rate from St. Helena to San Francisco is $2.35; the Board rate is $2.20. The present rate to Port Costa is $2.05; the Board rate is $1.70. The present rate from Redding to San Francisco is $6.50; the Board rate is $4.80. The present rate to Port Costa is $6.40; the Board rate is $4.20. The present rate from Red Bluff to San Francisco is $5.30; the Board rate is $4.40. The present rate to Port Costa is $5.20; the Board rate is $3.90. The present rate from Chico to San Francisco is $4.40; the Board rate is $3.40. The present rate to Port Costa is $4.30; the Board rate is $3.60. The present rate from Biggs to San Francisco is $5.80; the Board rate is $3.60. The present rate to Port Costa is $5.70; the Board rate is $3.25.

The schedule was adopted by the Commissioners without any change, but the protest of Commissioner Stoneman, who desired time to make his objections in writing, the action was reconsidered, and the whole matter went over until May 11th. The time allowed the railroads to appear and make objections to the proposed changes in rates of fares and freights was extended to the same date. The Board then adjourned to May 11th at 10 o'clock A. M.

A Fearful Power.

It is not to be wondered at that the railroad kings of the country are careless of public opinion and laugh at the idea that the people will ever be able to bring them under control. In a money point of view the road interest is greater than that of the government. It collects and disburses more money than the government. It owes more and pays more interest. Two years ago the total stock of railroads amounted to $2,322,257,877. The debt of the same amount to $2,480,959,481. It is stated that a quarter of million of men are employed by these roads in various capacities. The number of stockholders and persons indirectly interested in the ownership is estimated at about the same figures as employes. The capital stock of the railroads was equal to about one-seventh of the assessed value of property in the Union. Their earnings were more than twice as much as the total receipts of the United States government, and their profits were $25,000 more than the entire expenditures of the Government. Railroads are being built now as fast as ever, and the statistics of 1879 are much under the present figures.

The National Anti-Monopoly League has inaugurated battle to this colossal power. The League fights against fearful odds. The railroad interest controls most of the State Legislatures and Congress and the Executive branch of the Federal government. It controls the Associated Press, through which most of the newspapers of the country get their news. It owns or controls a large number of prominent newspapers professing to be the organs of each of the political parties.

Enormous as is the wealth of the railroad power, powerful as it is to hold upon the State and Federal governments, and extensive as are its means for misleading the public as to the principles advocated by its opponents and of confusing the minds of the people as to the means at stake, we yet believe that in the end the Anti-Monopoly League, or the political party which adopts its platform, will win. We believe this because we believe that though the people are slow to move they are sure of foot, and that the amount of sophistry will receive a man to being robbed. The people are fifty millions strong, and the day they learn that fact the country will cease to be dominated by the railroad power.

—Discovery of a new cure. Undoubtedly there are deeper-seated conditions, depending upon heart disease, etc., that cannot be reached by medicine. But these are very unusual, and are not, strictly speaking, genuine cases of Dropsy. HUNT'S REMEDY for the Kidneys and Bladder is a positive cure for Dropsy in all its forms, and may be relied upon to relieve its complications with other diseases. Try HUNT'S REMEDY, the Great Kidney and Liver Medicine, if afflicted with any disease of the Kidneys, Bladder, Liver, or Urinary Organs.

Sold by all Druggists. Trial size, 75 cents.

No. 1, is quotable at $1.35@$1.40, outside figures for choice milling, and No. 2 at $1.30@$1.32½ ⅌ ctl.

BARLEY—A few lots of strictly choice standard Chevalier might be placed, but it is said that there is none up to the desired standard in the market. Feed continues the only description to show any movement. The sales reported today were: 700 and 200 ctls choice feed, $1.25; 1000 ctls good do, $1; and 1000 ctls fair do, $0.97½. Brewing is quotable at $1.05@$1.12½ for fair, and $1.15@$1.20 for bright brewing; standard Chevalier, $1.15@$1.20; outside figures for choice.

OATS—The firmness continues, although no sales were reported today. Feed and choice, $1.50@$1.62½; common at $1.40@$1.47½; Surprise, $1.70@$1.77½ ⅌ ctl.

CORN—Was sold in a small way on Change this morning at lower prices. We will note by the following, sales: 600, 300 and 200 sacks Yellow, $1.20@$1.25; 400 sacks and 300 sacks do, Small round Yellow, $1.30@$1.35; and 300 sacks White is quotably nominal at $1.25@$1.30 ⅌ ctl. No sales having been reported in other grains.

HAY—Wheat is quotable at $12@$14; wild oat, $12@$13; stock, $9@$10; alfalfa, $9@$10 ⅌ ton.

RYE—Is now on the market, but is not wanted. There is no demand, and sales are made with difficulty.

BUCKWHEAT—Quotable at $1.85@$2 ⅌ ctl.

STEAM—Per bale: 60@62c.

TALLOW—Prime quality continues on the upgrade from that recently as more reasonable. Home bulls are asking 7½@7¾c ⅌ lb, and Eastern bulls 6½, $5.50 Humboldt, Peaches, $1.10 and 1½@1¾ ⅌ lb. Sales reported: Peaches and Tomatoes, $1.10@$1.15; Early Rose, 1½@1¾c.

ONIONS—Were weaker today at $1.62½@$1.75 ⅌ ctl.

LATEST NEWS —FROM— IRELAND

The Conference Discussing the Relief Bill.

CHICAGO, April 22.—The Times, London cable advices of the 21st inst. that it seems to state that the conference of the Land League which met yesterday was of the most important character to the Irish people and the class of the delegates. Parnell was in the chair. It was a very large number of visitors from all parts of Ireland and many from England, who took the liveliest interest in the proceedings. Nearly one thousand delegates were present, being representatives from every Branch League. The chair was occupied by Parnell, who opened the proceedings by a speech, mainly to the effect that the Land Bill was well enough conceived but was well nigh unworkable. Its execution would fail to give the relief demanded, and any attempt to carry out the bill would result in endless litigation, in which the tenant would have the worst of it, when opposed by the moneyed landlords. The capabilities of the bill do not reach the true evil. It does not take into consideration many of the most important of the interests involved, especially those of the lower classes. The interest in the debate, which was of an extended character, was shared by all. It will be impossible to tell until the adjournment what will be the result of the discussion. All indications point, however, to the rejection by the conference of the bill, on account of the inadequacy of its provisions to meet the situation. The vast number of spectators present took great interest in the debate, cheering vociferously the utterances of the various speakers, and more particularly those strongest in denunciation of the bill and advising its rejection. The town is full of people, and great crowds are in the streets. It is a long time since the Irish capital has seen such throngs of people.

THE LAND BILL DISTURBS.

Lord Beaconsfield's death is of serious moment, in connection with the bill measure, as he would have accepted more readily than Salisbury or the Duke of Richmond. Parliament is adjourned until Monday. The Land League Conference in Dublin have formulated objections, but they are not likely to jeopardize the second reading of the bill.

PARNELL ON THE BILL.

DUBLIN, April 25. Parnell, speaking at a meeting near Newry, declared it impossible for an honest man to learn what were his intentions in the bill.

THE BISHOPS ON THE LAND BILL.

The Irish Catholic Bishops held, April 22th, a meeting, at which they considered the Land bill. A fortnight ago, on the initiation of Archbishop McCabe, a committee of five bishops was appointed to examine the bill. This committee was instructed to take the opinion of lawyers as to the probable working of clauses of the bill, and to which there had been great diversity of opinion. This has been done, and the report of the committee was considered. It is not easy to see how the Bishops can arrive at a unanimous judgment of approval or recommendation to their flocks, seeing that they differ widely on some essential points. The Bishop of Ossory, Dr. Donnelly and Dr. Leahy, declared that tenants who are under an excessive rent are not conscientiously obliged to pay such rent, even when they have contracted to pay it, and he has justified their availing themselves of the provisions of an immorally immoral to reduce the rent to a fair standard. It is generally believed that the Bishop of Ossory, Dr. Donnelly, and Dr. Leahy, and Bishop Nally, of Meath. Archbishop McCabe is diametrically opposed to any teaching that is repugnant to the contract, deliberately entered into, is permissible. He says that whatever rent is undertaken, the tenant is bound to pay. Should he be able, and yet seek to avoid fulfilling his contract, he commits the sin of injustice and cheating, and will be bound hereafter to make full restitution to landlords. Should he reply that he is unable to pay the rent which he has promised, he may, of course, solicit a remission of rent, but cannot take the matter into his own hands, and will not be morally justified in holding to the land in defiance of the contract. Such a course would be the stipulated rent. It is not easy to see how a modus vivendi can be negotiated between these extreme views. If any united action is agreed upon and any recommendation is made to the Irish people by the Bishops, it will certainly be in the direction of the more moderate aims that were advocated last week by the Land League Convention, and will tend to an acceptance of the Government measures as a whole, while reserving the liberty to make such alterations in detail.

THE DANGER OF PROTECTIONISTS.

LONDON, April 27.—Commenting on Dillon's speech the Pall Mall Gazette says: If the Land Bill passes, the Irish Parliament of the Land bill getting through Parliament is now to prevent the occurrence of famines and disasters in Ireland. It has always been felt that the weakest point in the present position lies in the possibility of evictions on a large scale taking place in the interval before the new enactment could come in operation. The danger, if Mr. Dillon is right, is very close upon us and in a very formidable shape. Mr. Dillon is bailiff was threatened with dirtied boiling water was thrown on him. In Tipperary the people gathered to meet a bailiff writes. It is said that all firearms were confiscated, but that they meant to use them if the police had not arrived. Evictions in which some were stabbed with bayonets, the police withdrew without serving the writs.

FIVE THOUSAND PEOPLE EVICTED.

Next week the Irish members will make another appeal to the Government to stop eviction for a year. Upwards of 5,000 families are now decreed, and in some districts the people openly state that they will not leave their homes without a fight.

Ireland's Faith!

Father Burke On Ireland's Patron Saint.

ST. PATRICK'S PRAYER.

Honored Among the Saints of God.

The Very Rev. T. N. Burke, O.P., preached on Thursday night, March 17, to a crowded congregation in St. Patrick's church, Dominic street, on the life of St. Patrick. The eloquent Dominican took as his text the words of St. Paul to the Philippians: "And some he gave apostles, and some prophets, and others some evangelists, and others again doctors and pastors unto the perfecting of the saints, unto the work of the ministry, unto the edifying of the body of Christ." Having dwelt on the high position among the saints of God and the high mission of the Apostle, Father Burke described the coming of St. Patrick to Ireland in the year 432, and his consecration by Pope Celestine. He was not there that evening to go through the ordinary facts of the life of St. Patrick, because they were as familiar to his hearers as they were to him, but he wished them to accompany him in his thoughts upon a great mission, upon this man who came, and upon the people to whom he came, and upon the mass of his ministrations. He arrived in Ireland in 432, three hundred years before the Saxon over the water, over heard the name of Jesus Christ. He arrived in Ireland as the apostle of Ireland. Therefore, he (Father Burke) asked them to consider what were the qualities necessary in the apostle of a nation sent by the Catholic Church in the name of Christ to preach the Gospel; and, secondly, he would ask them to consider what were the necessary dispositions of a people to whom that apostle preached, and they would find in Patrick the very type and ideal of an apostle, and in the people of Ireland the very type and ideal of

PEOPLE SUCH AS GOD INSTRUMENTATED

As the subject of an apostleship, and, consequently, they would behold in him our wonderful fruits of Patrick's ministry. The first thing that was necessary in an apostle was the voice to speak, and, consequently, the affection of a man's heart could not, and, perhaps, should not, be must so poly to illustrate in his own life and in his own conduct the Gospel which he preaches. All the preaching that ever yet was spoken to man never convinced a single man, never converted a single soul, never made one Christian, unless the man who spoke was a living illustration of the word. Well had Patrick these three requirements, this man whom the Lord God had foreseen and foreshown for ages to come, this man in the island of ours, called Ireland, to leave the faith as rooted in the land that it was to be planted in the hearts of the people, and in our personal history—that it was to form the character of our national character, the character of every man amongst us; that it was to be the distinguishing mark, the sign, the badge that should distinguish us from all

WHEN LEAVING HOME THEY SCATTERED

THEMSELVES

Over the face of the earth; that it was to remain with them in national glory, when national life, when national prosperity, when the very language was to fail them, the faith was to remain. Well, then, was it to be the bearer of such a message to such a people! First of all, had he the mission? He says: he was careful before he came to Ireland to prostrate himself at the feet of God, and to seek from Christ, the head of Catholic Church, to receive from his hands his episcopal consecration and his mission to the people of Ireland. He says that St. Patrick the second attributes of an apostle! His answer was that Patrick must have been a holy man, a man of God, and he was nearly sixty years of age when he came to Ireland, and he spent nearly all those years in study, under two of the greatest saints commemorated in the annals of the Church—St. Germain, of Auxerre, and St. Martin, of Tours, for that very would his mission be, in vain could all his learning, if St. Patrick had not the illustration of the Gospel which he preached. In other saints we find the traces of their meditation in their writings, but St. Patrick wrote but little; his glorious character, his gigantic proportions of sanctity were

ENGRAVED IN THE TRADITIONS OF THE PEOPLE.

And in the early records of his life, and they told us far more vividly than spoken or written words how wonderful was the sanctity of this man, and how completely in his life he illustrated that perfect type of Catholic doctrine which he preached so eloquently in the Irish tongue. He preached to them the duty of prayer, and he put that prayer into the very hearts core of the Irish people. There was not on this earth a people so devoted to prayer. He (Father Burke) knew not what there might be in the future for them. He loved to think upon their glorious past, and he loved to think upon the things that he himself had seen and heard, and it seems to him the time of which he was reared. Up to this at least our people were a people of prayer, prayer was

FROM THE OPEN DOORS OF THE LITTLE

CABINS

As you walked through the village far away from city or railroad. And this spirit of prayer Patrick put into the very hearts of our fathers, and this spirit of prayer stood by them when all else was taken from them, and monastery were all destroyed by the ruthless hand of the persecutor, when nothing remained to the people but the prayer and gift of prayer, and Ireland might say with Job, "Nothing is left me, O God! but the lips with which I can pray to thee." Not only must the apostle be all he had described and more, but the people to whom he preached must have qualities, gifts, graces, and endowments to make worthy of the apostle. The preaching of the faith demanded an intelligent or intellectual people, because the gift of the faith was based upon the highest mysteries; secondly, the people must have, in addition to their intelligence, the precious gift of docility, taking with grateful hearts and with docile minds all that their apostle teaches them; and thirdly, fidelity, tenacity, determination, fortitude, and proper others for the word of God. Having pointed out how the Irish people excelled at that early date in intelligence and civilization, and with what docility they embraced the faith, Father Burke asked

WAS THAT FORCEST OAK OF IRELAND'S RELIGION TO YIELD TO ANY STORM,

To fall under the stroke of any woodman, or persecutor? Answer, ye army of heroes, who died fighting foot to foot, inch by inch, over every sacred sod of Irish soil, when the pagan Dane came to wipe the Christ and his religion out of the land, but with three hundred years our fathers rose, and fought and died, and at length Christ the pagan invader into the Ocean! Ireland's tree of Catholicity never yielded to any blast. Answer it, O ye unhappy Eastern breezes that had come to us fraught with the curse of persecution and heresy for three hundred terrible years, and strike upon that glorious trunk of Ireland's Catholicity! But never did she lose a branch—not a leaf. Never did she bend before the storm, and she raised her head to-day as graceful, as beautiful, as loaded with every flower of promise and fruit of fulfilment as in the day

WHEN THE DYING HAND OF PATRICK WAVED

ITS LAST BENEDICTION

Over her, and when, with his fainting and dying voice, he made his last prayer to God that Ireland might keep her faith until the end of time. Oh! let us keep our faith; it was almost the only gift they had left in this world. They had taken everything from us, everything that would make life pleasant or dear; they had taken every tradition of our grandeur and national greatness from us; they had left us but one thing, and that they left because they could not tear it out of the bleeding hands of Ireland—her holy Catholic faith. Let those who pray that Patrick's work, that had lasted so long, might last for ever, and that we might come to behold him where, surrounded by Ireland's confessors and virgins

DEPLORABLE MISERY IN MAYO.

Shooting the People for Stealing the Potatoes.

Late Irish papers are filled with accounts of eviction scenes in every portion of that rack-rented island. Her Anthony MacHale, curate of Laherdane, county Mayo, thus describes the sad scene which transpired in his vicinity of April 1st last:

The world has not heard the last of Francis Lorenzo Conoyn. Last Tuesday Thomas F. Routledge, Esq., sub-sheriff of Mayo, accompanied by a police force of one hundred men, appeared on the Carrowkeile estate, with instructions to drive irom their houses twenty-four families, consisting of over one hundred individuals. Poetry.

LEO THE THIRTEENTH.

BY FANNY TARBLL.

Not for the bale that is reaches thy hand,
Not for the riches thy hands have stored
Over a world of sin and strife.

Not for the glory of high estate
Either of millions of pilgrim feet
Lavish of love of the heavenly gate,
Thronged in the saint Christ's victory seat;

Not for the crimes of unholy hands,
Not for the wrongs that the Church has borne,
Plundered and stripped and the godless lands,
Hated to the hand and contempt—scorn—

Nay, not for these do thine eyes behold
A nation wrung with the throes of years
Lie down in a paradise of love-spoiled
And bathe thy feet with them grateful tears.

O beautiful feet with glory shod!
O beautiful eyes now dim with pain!
Thrice holy the dust those feet have trod—
The soil where a glance from those eyes has lain!

Full vainly they tried, the lying knaves,
To drive a curse on our Leo the Jewel;
He thought of her hands and her famine graves,
And he gave her a blessing instead.

They tried with the slanderer's sapless tongue,
They tried with the flatterer's nipple knee;
On each cowly name their filth they flung,
And the pulse of their black hearts leaped with glee.

But he thought of the men who held on high
The flag of their faith laid flood and flame—
He thought of the men who joyed to die
To save the altar they loved from shame.

He looked at the mummers false and sly,
And he thought of the oldest Pharisee;
He heard the naked and hungry cry,
And he thought of Jesus of Galilee.

Then he turned from the foe, now masked as friend,
Now crouched and fawning—but all too late—
And he said, "No message of wrath I'll send
To the land that is scored with Cromwell's hate."

And he poured out the myrrh, and he poured the wine,
And he poured the balm for the wounds that bleed,
And we know him now, mid rapture divine,
For a Vicar of Christ the Lord, indeed.

How I Won O'Leary's Lost His Bride.

AN IRISH SKETCH.

[WE THINK FOR THE MONITOR, BY JULIA HOLLANDS.]

In the county of Cork, a good many years ago, lived James O'Brien, a prosperous farmer, who was blest with as fine a family of sons and daughters as any father could be proud of. His eldest daughter, Katie, was the chapel where the family heard Mass was three miles from O'Brien's house, and not a Sunday did Katie ever miss walking those three miles to Mass; and many a swain would leave his own road to accompany her. Every one knows it used to be the custom among the peasantry of Ireland for the old people to chose a mate for their boy or girl when they were old enough to marry; nevertheless, the young people would meet sweet-eyes at each other when they were at fair or market.

Every young man for miles around, who thought he had any possible chance, would send his father to Mr. O'Brien to see if he would give his daughter in marriage, but Mr. O'Brien was in no hurry to part with his child until he found a suitable match for her.

Adjoining O'Brien's holding was the well-stocked farm of John O'Leary. It was rumored that O'Leary had considerable money laid by; and a well-stocked farm and considerable money was something not to be slighted. For several years O'Leary's sister kept house for him, but death came and carried her off, so he was left with no one to look after his cows, the milk and butter, which he had in abundance. While his sister lived he never thought of marrying, but, now that she was dead, he must get some one to look after his extensive dairy farm. John had often seen Katie O'Brien's dimpled hands make many a nice roll of butter. But he had no taste for beauty; a good cow, in his estimation, being far better than a beautiful woman. He knew that when Katie would marry she would receive a large dowry, so he thought if he was to get married, Katie would be the best in the market. Accordingly, he sent word to O'Brien, that he was coming to ask for the hand of his daughter. One evening he came, with his spokesman, for in those days no match could be made without the intervention of a friend. O'Brien invited them into his comfortable sitting-room, and the three men sat down to discuss the subject and to bind the bargain that would forever seal the fate of the beautiful Katie O'Brien, without asking her opinion about it. O'Brien told them what he would give with his daughter, and O'Leary stated what he was worth. Each seemed well satisfied, and they drank to the future bridegroom and bride, in order to bind the bargain.

All the following week the O'Briens were very busy slaughtering geese and turkeys for the wedding, and all the young people in the parish were expecting a good time. O'Brien had a beautiful Devonshire cow, which O'Leary had his eye on, but he forgot to ask for her when he was binding the bargain, so at the end of the week he went over to O'Brien's and said:

"I would like to have that Devonshire cow included with your father's dower."

"O'Leary, I am a man of my word, and I'll give you what I promised, and nothing more," said O'Brien.

"Very well, then," replied O'Leary, "you may keep your daughter, Mr. O'Brien."

Now, O'Brien was no fool; he would be a great disgrace to Katie, if being generally known that his daughter and O'Leary were to be married, so his anger was getting the mastery of him, and he was about to seize hold of his intended son-in-law and hurl him out of the house, when Katie suddenly appeared upon the scene. She had been an unobserved listener to all that passed between her father and O'Leary. She laid her hand gently upon her father's arm and said:

"Father, have I ever let all my life displeased you?"

"No, my child," said he, "you have ever been an obedient and dutiful daughter; but why question me thus?"

"Well, then, father, you will grant me this one request, give O'Leary to me."

"Very well, then, since you wish it," and turning to O'Leary he said:

"You may have the cow, and my blessing with it."

O'Leary departed quite satisfied, without so much as thanking his prospective father-in-law.

After he left, Katie laughed outright, and her black eyes sparkled with merriment, but none in that house knew what mischief was brewing in her quickly sifted brain.

The customary booked for night of the wedding came at last. The marriage was to take place at O'Brien's house, and the venerable Father Terrence Mahoney was to unite them in the holy bonds of matrimony. The guests began to arrive early in the afternoon. The house was brilliantly lighted with wax candles; the candlesticks had walks were prettiously decorated with evergreens, and over the sitting-room door was an artistic arch, in which the sacred word, "Welcome," was conspicuous place, neatly interwoven with holly and fern. But the bridegroom did not put in appearance. If you had gone to the kitchen you might have seen her, assisting her mother and sisters to get things ready for the marriage feast, and you would occasionally hear her mother say

"Katie, you had better go and dress for the marriage ceremony." Time enough, invariably was her answer.

At last her father came in and said:

"Katie, why are you not dressed?"

"I shall be ready in a minute, Father," she replied as she quickly tripped away. In about ten minutes she returned, not dressed in her bridal robes, as all expected, but leading into the room, where the guests were seated, a nice fat cow, with its head and horns adorned with streamers. She led the cow straight up to Father Terrence, and said:

"Father, allow me to make you acquainted with John O'Leary's intended bride."

"Child, what does this mean?" demanded the venerable man.

"It means, Father," said the proud-spirited girl, drawing herself up to her full height, "it means that I would rather die than marry John O'Leary." She then related John's meanness and how he wanted to get the cow, concluding by saying:

"Now, Father Mahoney, please proceed with the ceremony, and marry this couple." At this a shout of laughter burst from the guests, and the young man gave three cheers for Kate O'Brien, and three more for the horned bride. O'Leary left the house in a fearful rage, and covered with confusion.

"Be me boots, Katie, said the Father, "I'm glad you treated the nasty upstart like that, an' I'll give you a hundred pounds more, the day you are married, than I was goin' to give you to-day, my darlin'."

A tall, manly form came forward and whispered a few words in Katie's ear, and Katie blushed and nodded assent. He then said, addressing himself to her father:

"Mr. O'Brien, Katie and I have lived each other for a long time; I want neither cows nor money, for I prize her above all earthly things, and as our friends are all here expecting a wedding we had better not disappoint them."

"We will not disappoint them," said O'Brien, "you may have her and my blessing with her."

The happy couple were married, and next vine-clad cottage wherein live Katie and her husband, contented and happy, and she never regrets her choice of a husband, while John O'Leary is for ever lamenting the manner in which he coveted his neighbor's cow, and thereby lost his bride.

A Needle Transmitted from a Mother's Body to her Child.

A most extraordinary natural accident, and one for the discussion of physicians, came to light a few days ago, in which a needle taken into the body of a lady, nine years ago, worked out of the thigh of her third child, a baby of one year. The lady in question is the wife of Mr. Harry Isaacs, a cigar maker, who lives on Market street, Louisville. At the time of her accident Mrs. Isaacs was unmarried, and was then Miss Pauline Coblens. The needle was encountered in a carpet, and penetrated her foot the full length. A physician was called in immediately but the needle could not be found, although it was known to be in the foot. She suffered great pain, and for four months was unable to leave her bed. During that period three physicians made frequent attempts to extract the needle, and the knife was used extensively, without success, however. Miss Coblens was quite fleshy before the accident, but fell off nearly from the long confinement. At length she was able to get about with the aid of crutches, but she continued to suffer from the needle. The pain decreased gradually with the time she was able to get about, and she regained her former fleshiness. Finally she felt the needle only at periods when there was a change in the weather. The movement of the needle seemed to be upward, and the point was stationary, but not with the needle. About five years ago she was married to Mr. Harry Isaacs. Three children are the fruit of that union, the youngest of which is a boy named Arthur, who is about a year old. The pain which troubled the mother left her even before the birth of her child, and the total disappearance of the pain she was wont to feel was a subject of remark and pleasure to her. On Monday a week ago her baby, who had since its birth manifested a kindly disposition, was restless and cried all night. The cause of the child's ailment was not discovered until the following morning, when, in giving it a bath, the mother discovered somethink black protruding through the skin of the child's thigh. She quickly held of it, and was frightened when she found the thing of a resating substance. She, however, pulled it from its nest and extracted the dark object. Imagine her surprise when she found it was a needle, black and corroded. The child fell into her hand while examining it. The recollection of the needle, which had caused her much pain, came vividly before the mother and she felt keenly for her child. The embarrassment of her relatives was also forced itself on the mother, and the connection of the two served as a clew as to how the needle came to be in the child's thigh. The mother says it would be almost impossible for the child to have taken up the needle without her finding it out, as the child would have made it known in piteous cries, as it did when the needle worked out.

HOW TO GET MARRIED.

Some Excellent Suggestions for Young Men and Women.

This is a very interesting question, and one which most people think about a good deal. But it is not one question only. There are several things to be considered about it. Let us take them one by one.

In a certain old-fashioned receipt-book you will find the question treated "How to cook a Hare," and the instructions naturally begin with the warning, "First, catch your hare." This is the first thing to be done in this case, also; but you must be a little particular as to the kind of hare you catch. Make sure that it is a good one. But why be so very careful? For the following excellent reason

THIS IS AN EXTREMELY IMPORTANT MATTER. And a serious one, though you may be accustomed to treat it lightly. It is one which concerns your happiness for perhaps the whole of your life; for it is not as if you could get a divorce, as the world vainly imagines; your marriage, once validly contracted, can only be broken by death. And not only does it concern your happiness in this life, but also that which is to come. Moreover, marriage among Christians is a sacrament, and, therefore a sacral as well as an honorable thing.

THE FIRST CONSIDERATION OF ALL

Is, of course, about religion; do not, then, marry anyone not of your own faith. The Church abhors such marriages, and gives dispensations very unwillingly. The danger to your own soul is great, especially as things are with us now. That Protestants here are, generally speaking, richer and in a better social position, while it is an inducement to you, will also be a temptation against your faith. Do not, then, marry a Protestant, unless there is a good chance of converting him or her, and, even if there is such a chance, remember the peril to yourself, and that your own soul is what you have to take care of above all else.

SET IF YOU WILL INDEED BE MARRIED

Without the blessing of the Church, hear in mind what the Church absolutely requires in such a case. First, that it be done before a priest; if you are married by a Protestant minister you commit a most grievous sin, and are excommunicated by the very act. Also, that you obtain from the other party a most distinct and solemn promise that the children, boys and girls, shall all be brought up Catholics; and that your own practice of your religion, as well as theirs, shall meet with no hindrance whatever. If these requisitions are not secured, the marriage can not be celebrated, instead of taking all this trouble, and running into all this danger, it is ever so much better to MAKE UP YOUR MIND TO MARRY A CATHOLIC.

And a good Catholic at that. Take no one merely on account of good looks, or for the sake of money merely. Be sure that he or she has qualities that will make you happy as long as you live. Look out for one who is honest and industrious, who is not extravagant, and a burden instead of a help; who goes regularly to Mass and to the Sacraments; who is free from bad habits, and especially from the disgraceful vice of drunkenness. Above all, take care always this last point; do not make a hell for yourself upon earth.

SO MUCH FOR WHO IT SHALL BE.

Common sense ought to tell you this, and more. Now, let us see how to cook your hare after it has been caught.

Your intended is a good practical Catholic, then, that is understood. So you will just go to the priest in the parish of one of you, and give in your names without any fuss to be called out in the Church. Without a reason, and a good one too, you have no right to be dispensed from this. It is not a matter merely of choice, nor is it in the power of the priest; it is a law of the Church, which cannot be put aside with pleasure. Do not, then, make the ridiculous objection that "you had rather not," as if that made any difference; you might as well say that you had rather not obtain from meat on Fridays. And do not urge that "people will talk"; such a foolish excuse is not sufficient. If there is no reason against it,

THE BANNS MUST BE CALLED,

And you ought not to be ashamed if they are, but rather if they are not. And as for talking, there is really a great deal more reason for people to talk if they are not called than if they are. The banns are appointed by the Church that people may know of your marriage, and that, if there is any real objection, it may come out before it can make any trouble. If you try to avoid their publication, it looks as if there were some objection. There is no disgrace in being married, and it is very silly to act as if there were.

YOU SHOULD ALSO GO TO CONFESSION

Shortly before you are married; the very day before, if you can. It is a sacrament which you are going to receive, and if you receive it in mortal sin you are guilty of a horrible sacrilege. And even this is not all; you also will not get the special grace or assistance in your new state of life which this sacrament is meant to give, an assistance which make its burden light and its duties easy. Perhaps you will never get this grace in its fulness; certainly not till you repent. Go to confession, then, even if you have confessed not long ago, in such a matter, it is well to be on the safe side. Then, lastly, if possible,

TRY TO HAVE A NUPTIAL MASS.

This is the spirit and intention of the Catholic Church, with whom every one should try to comply. And besides, complying with this spirit of the Church, you will really satisfy yourselves much better by so doing; you will never be sorry that you did as much as that for the honor of the sacrament, for your own credit, and to set a good example to others. Well, then, in short,

HOW ARE YOU GOING TO GET MARRIED?

First, I am not going to marry a Protestant, or a backslider, or a bad, bad, bad Catholic. Second, I mean to be sure that I marry a good Catholic, one who practices all the duties of religion and morality, who sets a good example to others, and who is fit to make me happy for life. Third, I am going to have the banns published the full number of three times. Fourth, I am going to frequent the sacraments. I will have a Mass if I can. Do this, and you will please God, gain His grace, and do a great deal to secure your happiness in this world and the next.

Infamous Assault Upon Jesuits.

On Tuesday week, March 15, towards five o'clock in the afternoon, in the full glare of daylight, about the neighborhood of Five Oaks, a gentleman (apparently) whose gray beard would suppose some experience of life, and should suppose wisdom in some degree, was set upon with two ladies (whose attire would lead to believe). He met small parties of tourists in twos and threes, taking their usual walk. As it could not have been his intention (if his conduct be a sample of its behaviour to all refugees), it must have been his Christianity—all the warmer, perhaps, for a little drink—which inspired him with heroic courage, and enabled him to rise to the full dignity of the prosperous Hip whip was his gospel weapon. Driving past these scattered parties, he slashed at them in their faces, wounding no less than six, one of whom is a venerable scholar of 60 years of age, whose profound learning has made his renown in France, Germany, and Italy. All were inoffensive gentlemen and refugees like Christians and true Jesuits are in Madagascar and Zambezi. The Jesuits are in Natal. The Irish Trappists have established a new Dunbrody in South Africa, and all through the English Colonies there are zealous priests of Irish and English descent. Portuguese Missionaries are in Benguela, Spanish priests in Morocco, and French Fathers in Algiers. "In a word," says Mgr. Lavigerie, "the point of the three shores washed by the Atlantic, the Mediterranean and the Indian Ocean has escaped this immense siege, which the divine mercy seems to prepare to put an end to the destruction of the human race. We cannot doubt in view of all these signs that we are assisting at one of those great events by which Providence changes the face of nations." To complete this work the Church is now engaged in penetrating to the interior of the Continent and, as the plans there Mgr. Lavigerie proclaiming elaborate and interesting report, to which we shall refer again.

Propagating the Faith in Africa.

Providence has so arranged events during this century that civilization follows and blockades the dark continent and the Church is piercing it. Mgr. Lavigerie, the zealous Archbishop of Algiers and the Apostolic Delegate in charge of the missions of Central Africa, has lately spoken very forcibly in a report which he made not long since. He places a map of Africa before us and points to France occupying Algiers and Senegal, piracy driven from Tunis and Tripoli, Egypt opened her ports to the commerce of the world, America finding a standing place in Liberia, England at the Cape, Holland in the Transvaal and the Orange Republic, and the whole coast from Natal to the Red Sea opened to the world by late treaties with England. The mission of the Church is entrusted to pacific legions, who also have mapped out this wonderful continent. The sons of St. Francis are in Tunis, Tripoli, Egypt and the land of the Galias. The Lazarists are in Abyssinia. The Fathers of the Holy Ghost and of the Sacred Heart of Mary are in Zanzibar, Congo, Senegal and Senegambia. The African Seminaries of Lyons are labouring in the deadly atmosphere and on the hostile coasts of Dahomey, Guinea and the Gold Coast. Missionaries from Verona evangelize the plateaus south of Egypt. The Jesuits are in Madagascar and Zambezi. The Oblates are in Natal. The Hottest Climate.

The hottest climate in the world probably occurs in the desert interior of Australia. A Thermometer was hung on a tree, sheltered from the sun and wind. It was graduated to one hundred and twenty-seven degrees, yet so great was the heat of the air that the mercury rose till it burst the tube; and the year across the continent has been at least one hundred and twenty-eight degrees, apparently the highest ever recorded in any part of the world. Nevertheless, in the southern mountains and table lands three feet of snow sometimes fall in a day. The best sometimes, it is said, sets the forests on fire.

The Brilliant Achievement of a War Correspondent.

The publication of the details of the battle at Spitzkop between the Boers and the English was one of the most marvellous feats of newspaper and telegraph enterprise ever known. The London Standard sent Mr. Cameron, the hardy, resolute, fearless African explorer, with the British advance, to report its operations. He accompanied it in its difficult course to the summit of the fatal height. When the Boers made their resolute charge in the face of the English bayonets, about which they brag so much, and poured over into the basin, from which they drove the English like sheep, Mr. Cameron was knocked down, run over, trampled upon and ruptured. He showed his news paper credentials and note-book, and having established his professional identity, was requested to act as a flag of truce bearer to enable the British to take care of their wounded. He reached the British camp that night and wrote his despatch of about 2,000 words. That despatch was put upon the army field wires and reached the coast. Hence it travelled up to the east coast of Africa, over 3,000 miles, and tapped the East Indian wires in the Gulf of Aden; thence on the bottom of the Red Sea, another 2,000 or 3,000 miles to the Mediterranean, to Italy, thence through Italy, and over the Alps and through France and across the British Channel to London. Not stopping there, it goes to Alexandria, on the west coast of Ireland, and speeds across the Atlantic to New Fundland, thence to New York across the continent to San Francisco, and on the following morning it was printed in every daily newspaper in the civilized world—a thousand of them in this country.

The Life of the Czar.

At the time the late Czar was prevailed upon to wear a chain bronze plate under his shirt, a bullet was fired at his breast, and was made for him he could not bear its weight, so the expedient was adopted of causing his tunics to be padded with cotton wool stuped in a preparation which repelled the bullet. Nevertheless, if not bullet-proof, at least knife-proof, and difficult for even a bullet to pierce at a long distance.

THE MONITOR.
TWENTY-SIX YEARS OF PUBLICATION.
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
THURSDAY..... APRIL 28.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

MR. H. J. MCCORMICK left yesterday on another tour in the interest of the MONITOR. He intends visiting all the points between San Leandro and Stockton; thence to Sacramento, Marysville, Nevada, Downieville, Grass Valley, Colfax, Placerville, Sonora, and all places in the vicinity of each. Mr. McCORMICK hopes that all persons who have business indebted to the MONITOR will be prepared to settle their accounts when he calls, and he asks the aid of the Rev. clergy and friends of the paper, in every place he may visit to help him in propagating the cross that defends the Faith and the Church it represents.

Month of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

Next Sunday will inaugurate the month specially devoted to the ever Blessed and Immaculate Mother of God, and we sincerely hope that every reader of the MONITOR will participate in the beautiful religious devotion which the Church has instituted for the honor of that celestial Mother whom the very angels love with heavenly ardor.

How fitting it is that we Catholics, who have followed the mother of God through the agonizing period of her life which culminated on Calvary, where the lifeless form of her beloved Son hung upon the Cross, should rejoice with her in the triumph achieved by the glorious resurrection of the Son of God. May is especially a month of rejoicing, even the very earth itself seems to be arrayed in floral beauty in order to reflect back to heaven the resplendent glories which adorn the celestial dignity of our ever glorious Mother! Let Mary's month, then, be really and truly devoted to the praise of God in giving us such a powerful intercessor before the heavenly throne as that Mediatrix to whom the greatest saints have paid the most exalted honor. Every moment in each hour during the month of May should be given to Mary's honor; every aspiration of prayer we make should reach the portals of heaven laden with the incense of Mary's praise, and thus our humble homage will mingle with the joyful chants of the angelic celestial choirs who sing the glories of the sinless Mother of God.

Let every Catholic home have its little shrine of love in Mary's honor; let Catholic parents teach their children to reverence the blessed and beautiful name of the Queen of Christians and the Refuge of Sinners; and as the evening star appears in the sky, let every Catholic household gather around Mary's shrine and there mingle their prayers with the music of angels.

A great writer has said that no Catholic who is truly devoted to the Blessed Virgin can ever be lost, and if Catholics, in our day, were more faithful children of our fond Mother, there would be far less infamy in the world. Neglect to honor the Mother leads to infidelity to God, and those thousands of families lay the foundation of the loss of their faith by first becoming cold in their affection for that Mother whom the Fort of God left to us as His last legacy when expiring on the Cross.

How can Catholics become such ingrates to God as to turn their hearts from the suffering and sorrowing Mother who shared so deeply in the sufferings of her Divine Son! How can they hope to please God by despising the Mother whom He loved whilst living on earth, and to whom He assigned the highest place in heaven? Dead, indeed, to all the joys of the grace of God must be the callous heart that calls itself Catholic, yet cannot become inflamed with the burning zeal of the Blessed Virgin's love. Let none such be known to exist among the Catholics of this country wherein the Church has been placed specially under the protection of the Queen of Heaven. Let Catholic children sing her praises, let the voices of young and old intone her glories in canticles of joy, let every heart become encircled with wreaths of religion's sweetest flowers in this month, and thus prove our piety by exalting the glory of the purest of creatures ever formed by the hand of Almighty God.

Honor then, in Mary's month, the Mother whom the most exalted angels honor in heaven; give her your heart, and she, in turn, will open her maternal heart to receive your prayers, and thus turn your sorrow into joy. Be true children of Mary on earth, and despair can never darken your soul, when your hour of dissolution comes, she whom you have honored on earth will plead your cause before the celestial throne of God and gain for your souls that mercy for which sinners alone might plead in vain.

"Give Mary now—to-day—forever
One great gift—the first, the best;
Give her your heart, and ask her
How to give her all the rest."

The Catholic statistics of the British possessions in America, are as follows: Six Archbishops, twenty-six Bishops, 1,850 priests, 1,410 churches, and 43 chapels and stations. There are thirteen seminaries, thirty-five colleges, 157 academies, and 37 parochial schools. There are fifty-four asylums, and forty-eight hospitals, and the estimated Catholic population is 2,113,000. which is divided as follows: Province of Quebec, 1,291,210; in the Province of Ontario, of which Toronto is the metropolitan, 186,000; the Province of Toronto, the Catholic population is 263,000; in Nova Scotia, 110,000; in New Brunswick, 102,000; in Newfoundland, 71,000; in the West Indies there are about 165,000; in Vancouver's Island, 5,400; in the Northwest Territories, 32,000; in British Columbia, 20,000; in British Honduras, 20,000; and in British Guiana and Barbadoes, 18,000.

Falsehoods Promulgated by Perambulating Professional Lecturers.

Just at this time a number of so-called "Professors" are perambulating the State, enlightening the people upon the "Origin of Man," the "Science of the Unseen World," and other topics, of which they have as much conception as so many parrots have of the nature of paradise. Yet people flock to listen to the nonsense of these charlatans, and pay their money, in order to be told that God had no hand in the formation of mankind, that the human species is nothing more than an improved order of monkeys, and that the earth was evolved from natural causes without the intervention of a Creator. These vagaries are the second-hand stock-in-trade of the professional lecturers who gull the unsuspecting and serve up undiluted infidelity under the guise of science.

Just for curiosity sake we lay before our readers a few extracts from the discourse of one of these "Professors," who has attracted "crowded audiences" in this city during the past week. The disciple of Darwin is known as Professor Denton, and the subject upon which he discoursed was "The Age of Man," in the course of which he rebashed for his hearers the stale and worthless monkey theory of the Darwinian school of speculation, a theory which may well be called scientific discoveries by dunces. In this "enlightened" age, all a "professor" needs in lecturing successfully before the public is a bundle of big words infused with infidelity and besprinkled with blasphemy. Then such men are dubbed "scientists" by the very press that should protect the public from the glaring imposition.

If, as Professor Denton claims, man is only an improved monkey, the latter animal has greatly degenerated from its original skill and intelligence, for the reason that with the remains of the monkeys of past ages have been found signs which entirely annihilate the Darwinian theory. Thus, for example, what order of monkeys formed the specimens of pottery which have been discovered adjacent to the skeletons of the so-called progenitor of man! What breed of monkeys made the weapons of war, or the implements said to have existed in the tertiary or the pliocine periods, and which have been unearthed from the same strata that contained the remains of what Professor Denton calls "the most perfect monkey? Assuredly, if the monkeys of past ages could have built houses, manufactured knives, arrow heads and pottery, they would have degenerated into the useless brutes they are in the present age.

The majority of those "professors" can only agree to disagree, and each of them has some pet theory which he estimates as the "very latest discovery," which is only theory after all, and which can easily be confuted by the application of ordinary common sense. Thus, for instance, Professor Denton lectured last week on "The Philosophy of Death," in the course of which he drew this ridiculous picture of the heavenly sphere:

> The land of the immortals is no cloudland, but a world of mountains on which the clouds rest. Woods adorn their sides, while streams gushed the wind ripples over the grass; beautiful valleys, adorned with flowers; rills leaping from the mountains and dashing into foam on the rocks with which they come in contact; villages, towns, habitations of human beings; real men; real women; gardens with flowers and fruits; and as we pass through the streets of this city of the living, who have departed from the earth, some flash past us as rapidly as the lightning; others walk just as men and women walk through the crowded streets of our cities to day. Here is the home of the soul. Here are all the authors who have walked the earth—Socrates and Shakespeare, Robby Burns, Byron and Shelley—no blast soul that ever lived—Theodore Parker, teaching the true gospel to the multitudes who flock to hear him. There are halls, museums, theatres. In that world you will act just as you do here. If you are fond of books, you will associate with those who are, and look into the depths of the next world. If you are fond of music, you will go along with a hammer, looking for what geology has to unfold in the rocks of the next world. We shall go just where we desire, and do just as we please.

And this is the nonsensical infusion of infidelity for which people pay their money—just like so many monkeys attending a conventional gathering presided over by a gorilla! And such a heaven as this Professor has painted! Imagine terrestrial theatres transplanted to the celestial regions where some spirits are constantly perambulating, "hammer in hand," seeking for geological specimens! Better still, imagine Professor Denton delivering lectures before an audience of angels! Why, if this feature alone could possibly be introduced into heaven, it would be enough to make mankind regret that such "cruelty to animals" could be permitted within the portals of paradise! And what an idea this Professor must have of the "true gospel" when he cites Theodore Parker as preaching to the multitudes who flock to hear him! The Professor omits to tell us whether we will enjoy the luxury of our daily paper, the telegraph or telephone in the next world. True, he says that cities, towns and villages exist there, so, of course, railroads and street cars are a matter of course! Well, after all, the heaven of the Professor is scarcely a whit better than man's present dwelling place, and we must conclude, accordingly, that he talks about something of which he knows positively nothing; hence, we pity the poor sou pay their dollars to be dosed by such nonsensical nothings as the sickly sentiments advanced by the Darwinized Denton.

—One of the most distinguished prelates at the Court of Rome, Mgr. Vincent Nuni, Canon of St. Peter, and Prothonotary-Apostolic, has been designated by the Chapter of the Vatican Basilica to proceed to Barcelona and crown the image of Our Lady of Monserrat. The Bishop of Barcelona, in accord with other prelates of Spain, has petitioned the Holy Father to proclaim Our Lady of Monserrat the Patroness of Spain.

General Grant and Mexico.

We are gravely informed by telegraphic dispatches that Grant, "the greatest moral chieftain of the age," is going to conquer Mexico. How, or by what means, we are not told. All the satisfaction we get on this point is that "Generals Ord and Sherman will be in command." Consequently, we may infer from this that Grant will cross the Rio Grande like Cæsar did the Rubicon, and all who follow him need not feel any alarm, for they must remember that the train which takes them across the boundary carries also "Cæsar," that is Grant, "and his fortunes."

Well, of all the stuff and nonsense ever flashed across the wires, and we have had bushels of it, this is the most trivial and worthless. The fact of it is, Grant has been tramping around the world so much lately, that, like the fellow in the popular song, who had a steam leg, he cannot keep still, he must keep hopping around in spite of himself.

We do not believe, in his present peregrinations, he is being "coached" around by the stalwart Republicans, as was the case prior to his flight as a third-term candidate for the Presidency. It is probable, he laid his wires, while in Mexico, for some scheme of personal aggrandizement, and this idea is confirmed by the fact that his favorite son "Fred" has resigned his position in the army to accompany his father. Grant, it is well known, looks out for number One. He is credited with never having refused a gift from a bullion pup to $250,000, and still he is not satisfied. His immediate friends and associates are millionaires, and Grant, like "Whang the Miller," goes to Mexico to dig for gold. Why should not he, the favored soldier of fortune, be able to discover and control a bonanza like his friend Mackay? On his return from Mexico, Grant explained to our statesmen, politicians and capitalists, the wonderful field for American enterprise that open to them in the sister Republic. He was attentively listened to, was dined and feted in New York, Washington, and other great cities, and his words were telegraphed all over the country.

Grant was credited with having, for the first time, collated facts, arguments, and statistics relative to Mexico, which opened the eyes of the public to the immense advantages which would accrue to them from more intimate relations with, and the investment of capital in this rich but unfortunate country.

All seemed to forget that General Rosecrans, long ago, when Hamilton Fish was Secretary of State, presented to Congress the very same facts and figures that have lately been used by Grant. In fact, Grant stole Rosecrans' thunder. The latter (because he was a Democrat, and not made of such plant stuffs as fawn upon men whom he considered in every way his inferiors) received the cold shoulder, and his pamphlet was consigned to the waste basket. We sincerely hope Grant will accomplish great things in Mexico. We hope and trust he will carry along with him Belknap, Babcock, "Boss Shepherd," Wakeman and a score or two more of the same sort, that we can spare from California.

We pray that he may be successful there in inaugurating a "Worth's Day" that will eclipse anything that the blind and ungrateful New Yorkers can get up. Finally, we pray, that at the expiration of the present President of Mexico's term of office, Grant may be the choice of the people for that high dignity, and that he may continue to hold it, not only for a second and a third term, but ad infinitum.

"Star Route" Post Office Swindling.

At intervals, the country is startled by astounding developments of corruption and thievery in various departments of the Government. This time it is the Post Office, and "the stealing is of such great magnitude that," we are told, "compared with which the Ross Tweed regime villainies will go into history as respectable."

The man who is now making himself so uncomfortably busy in unearthing fraud's whereby millions are annually stolen from the public Treasury, is Postmaster-General James. He is a Catholic, and if other Catholic officials only practiced what they profess, how great would be the estimation in which they would be held in the eyes of citizens. The President has been fortunate in his selection of at least one member of his Cabinet who did not allow his seat to become warm under him before proceeding to business. If his good example should be followed by the heads of the Army, Navy, Treasury, and other departments of the Government, what a revolting mass of venality and corruption would be exposed to the public gaze. Now is the time for President Garfield to show what mettle he is made of. If he desires to refute, in the most emphatic manner, the charges of corruption made against himself during the Presidential campaign, in connection with the De Golyer, and Credit Mobilier scandals, now is the time to do it. Let the rascals and thieves "be hunted down," no matter how prominent in official circles, or how influential in the party councils. Mr. Garfield is credited with being a wily politician, a man of prudence and forethought. He can detect the whisperings in the air of the people's determination, all over the country, to cast off the shackles of party, to smash corrupt rings, and to elect none to office who do not possess the Jeffersonian qualifications of honesty, capability and efficiency.

The result of the recent elections in Philadelphia, Chicago, St. Louis, Jersey city and other places, cannot be lost on the President. Above all, the marvellous growth of the Anti-Monopoly League, which is independent of, and dictates to both of the two great political parties in the United States, should convince him, should convince all concerned, that an era of true reform is dawning upon the nation.

The People versus Monopoly.

As we pointed out in last week's issue the great political struggle for the future will be the producers, the laboring classes, against monopoly. In the East, the battle has already begun. The new organization, known as the Anti-Monopoly League, is rapidly spreading, and will soon be felt in some good work. It is independent of party lines, and both Democrats and Republicans are within its ranks. It has a giant to contend against, but, like David, it must not falter. It is now a-sling where there has been any rainfall and the country is very dry, and, in the last four years there has been very heavy frosts throughout the entire country. Even should there be a good harvest this year, it will be too late to repair the damage which has been done by the long continued drought, frosts and unusually cold weather. These facts, together with the adverse thereto, telegraphed in regard to the probable failure of the wheat crop in large areas of Russia, indicate the likelihood of a serious deficit in the grain crops of Europe for the present season.

As the indications are that this year's harvest will be more abundant even than last, the outlook for California is indeed bright. Business and trade of all kinds have been under great depression for the past few years, and we sincerely hope the turning tide of prosperity has been reached. And now comes the still further news that the Russian wheat crop has been a failure.

FAILURE OF THE RUSSIAN WHEAT CROP.

LIVERPOOL, April 23.—A Odessa special says: A St. Petersburg special to the Times thereon is as follows: The prevailing fears concerning the Russian crop of cereals are almost certain to prove a failure are well founded. Reports received from all parts of the country have been in all the districts upon the Volga, Southern Russia, and the Black Sea districts. In some district thirty-to-one hundred ears were destroyed. The government will consider the question, in the event of the grain crop failing, and merchants inform the same, the Black Sea's will have to supply corn, which they can do cheaper than the Eastern provinces of the Empire can do it.

If California had not been cursed by a railroad monopoly which robs the farmer, by extortionate freight rates, of much of his profits, there would be nothing to prevent our State becoming the most prosperous in the Union.

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE

Watsonville, Castroville, and Salinas Described—Sketch of the Old Mission at Monterey.

One of the most prosperous places I have yet visited is Watsonville, Santa Cruz county, on the line of the Pajaro Valley railroad. It commands a large proportion of the rich and well cultivated Pajaro Valley, which has a length of nearly twenty miles, and a width of fifteen miles. This valley is one of the most productive portions of the State, and possesses a climate that cannot be excelled for its salubrity.

The town is handsomely situated, and its main street is broad and level, having a width of twenty-three-quarters of a mile. On Saturdays it presents a very animated scene, that being the market-day of the farmers, and the number of hotels, stores, saloons, etc., is quite large. The town is also the rendezvous of the Pajaro Valley and Santa Clara villages, viz., good soil, ready markets, and a fine climate. A short distance below the town is Moss Landing, the principal shipping point for the surrounding country. Through the kindness of Mr. S. M. Loughlin, the agent in charge, I was shown through the six mammoth store-houses which Messrs. Goodall & Perkins have erected for the storage of grain, and which are capable of holding 15,000 tons. The steamships of this company visit this place regularly twice a week, and oftener in the busy season, carrying away annually about 10,000 tons of wheat and barley. A wharf, extending into the ocean about 1000 feet, has been built for the accommodation of vessels and every facility afforded to farmers to ship their grain at any season when prices are favorable.

The church in Castroville is the finest building in town, but is not as yet finished, as Father Curran is at present concentrating all his energies in the direction of a Catholic school, which he has established under the tutorship of Mr. McBumough. Forty scholars are in attendance, and I sincerely hope the efforts of the zealous pastor may be nobly seconded by the congregation, so that Catholic children may be saved to the Church by means of Catholic education. I learned incidentally during my visit to Castroville that one of the principal contributors toward the church in that place is J. B. H. Cooper, Esq., whose acquaintance I afterwards made. Both he and his sister, Mrs. Roth, have ever been foremost in their offerings towards the decoration of the Housed ticd, and heaven has blessed them with wealth "a hundred fold" in return for their charity to the Church. Having spent a few days very pleasantly and profitably with my cousin at that place, Father Curran, I set out for a visit to the county seat of Monterey county, located on the Southern Pacific Railroad, 118 miles from San Francisco. This place has a population of about 3,000 souls. Almost the first object I beheld on entering the place was the new brick church which the Catholics are erecting to replace the former wooden structure. The court-house is also a very imposing structure, and cost $60,000. During my twenty mile buggy ride from Castroville to Salinas and back I conversed with several farmers, from whom I learned that the land in this vicinity is very productive, the average yield being bushels of wheat and 50 bushels of barley per acre. In point of healthfulness of climate this region cannot be excelled. Monterey county is one of the largest counties in

THE TOWN OF SALINAS,

Farm and Home.

Farming in Switzerland.

I have wondered if there are such awkward ways of doing things outside of Egypt as are practiced here. The farming implements would be laughable if they were not monstrous. Tubal-Cain certainly made better-formed scythes than are used here. The axes are simply long sharp wedges with a hole near the top, and a short, straight stick in the hole for a handle. Hay forks are big and awkward, and twice as heavy as our stable forks.

Grain is oftener thrashed with the old-fashioned flail than otherwise. I wonder they do not tramp it out with oxen. It would be a slower process, and how to be slow is made a special study here. The plows are the climax of agricultural monstrosities. They are great cumbersome things made almost wholly of wood, with the beam mounted on two wooden wheels big enough for coal carts.

My friend used just such a plow yesterday on our farm. I half deny ownership now, when I think of it. It was pulled by six cows. Two men were driving the cows, and two men were holding the plow up. I followed and looked on. They were half a day plowing half an acre.

I am glad the whole concern, plow-men, cow-drivers and all, were hired, and not a part proper of the farm. I sat on a stone wall for half an hour and reflected whether it was possible Americans could not make small special farming profitable, with their soil and complete implements for farming, in the face of the fact that these people not only make a living, but save money, on a poor soil, and with the old-fashioned tools of Egypt to work it.

I am certain the whole secret lies in economy: in the saving of a hundred little things that shall outbalance even the waste of these awkward implements and these slow methods. There will not a blade of grass be seen among the vines here, nor a weed on the farm. There will not be a twig of wood left to rot, or a potato bug. A gentleman's private garden could not be cleaner or better kept than is the whole farm in Switzerland, and cultivation, such as is bestowed only in hot-houses in America, is common here to every farm. Not one foot of ground is left unused for. It may take a good deal of time, with such slow hands to do it, but it is done. Not a chip, not a straw, is wasted. "We put this little thing and that little thing together," said my friend, "and at the end of a year it makes a good deal." One cannot afford waste or bad farming on land at five or six or ten hundred dollars an acre and more.

Woman's Work.

Woman's work is never done. She would never have it done. Ministering to father and mother, cherishing her husband, nourishing her children—no true woman wants to see her work done. But because it is never done she needs resting times. Every night the heavy truck is turned up, the wheel horse is put up into the stable, and labor and cares are dismissed till the morrow. The thills of the household van cannot be turned up at night, and the tired housekeeper cannot go into a quiet stall for repose. She goes to sleep to-night feeling the pressure of the morrow. She must have "an eye" over all until every one is in bed, and must keep an eye ready to open at any moment to answer the need of children, and open both eyes bright and early to see the machinery well started for a new day. There is never any time that seems comfortable to spare—not a little children to much the better for it that the benefit will overflow from her into the whole household. She will bring home some new idea, and will work with the enthusiasm that comes from a fresh heart.

Family Fun.

He Stole that Prayer.

At the recent opening of the Nevada Legislature, an eastern minister was invited to perform the religious service. He accepted the call and closed the ceremony with the Lord's Prayer. When he had finished, State Senator Dolal turned to Senator Hammond and remarked audibly: "He stole that prayer, and I'll bet on it. I heard it almost word for word in Eureka at a funeral over ten years ago.

England's Debt to Ireland.

[From the Weekly Register.]

The interests of the people of Ireland must always possess the strongest claim to consideration in an English Catholic journal. To that people we owe, to a large extent, in the past, the preservation, in all their fullness, of the earnestness, the purity, and the simplicity of the Catholic Faith. In the present, we owe to them in great measure our priests and sisters, and much of what is progressive in the social, political, literary, and religious life of Catholics in this country. Without them, where had been many of our churches, our convents, our schools? The generous munificence of the few does not supply, and never can supply, the place of the pence of the many. On the question which is now uppermost in the national mind—namely, the question of the land in Ireland we are heartily at one with the people. We wish to see security given to them in the land of their birth. This is a social and an economical rather than a political question. It concernsthe lives of the masses. The problem of statesmen is, how to render life endurable for Irishmen at home. It is not creditable to English statecraft that it should remain unsolved." Too long has legislation regarded only the interests of the few, and left the many in Ireland miserable and without hope. Public interest is awake on this great question; and we may believe that now, at last, there will be found in the wisdom of statesmen, the means of bringing peace and content to Irish hearts, and comfort, happiness, and security to Irish homes. Every upheaving of the great social forces of a people hasits attendant evils in excesses and injuries. These seem to be inevitable. But, a Catholic people will not forget, that no movement can be permanently conducive to individual, or to national happiness, which contravenes moral law. Unhappily, England has taught Ireland that mainly, if not only, by agitation is redress of national grievances to be obtained. Thus changes which, in the self-governing English people, came gradually when the need arose, and developed almost unperceived in their progress, in Ireland are heralded by tumult and disorder. The reason is clear: Ireland is governed by a Parliament in which her voice is not potential, and which until lately was wholly swayed by the opinions of a minority in Ireland—a class which had monopolized power, wealth, and dignity in the country. In these respects there are signs of change—of change which is full of hope, and full of promise for the future. Much depends on the attitude of the Irish people at this momentous crisis of their history—not alone upon their unity, nor upon their resolution, but upon their sense of justice and their wise moderation.

The Late Czar.

A POLISH REFUGEE'S OPINION OF HIM.

This morning a reporter called on Mr. Sawitzky—he is a barkeeper in Grosa' saloon, Sixth and Market—but found him so busy at his work that he didn't have much time to talk about Russian politics. He also regretted that his limited acquaintance with the English language prevented him from expressing his ideas on the subject. Iand is ruled by the Russian Government. It is what they call 'Under-Russia.'"

"How did the Poles feel toward the late Czar?"

"Oh, they hated him. From the nobility down to the lowest peasant they detested him. He oppressed them; ground them down; persecuted them, until he had almost crushed them. He has done everything to the Poles that a tyrant could do. He has banished them, shot them, hung them, put them in prison, persecuted them in every way, all because they wanted to have a little freedom. They say he freed the serfs, but the serfs are as badly off now as ever."

"Did you ever suffer from his persecution?"

"I came away from Poland because the Government oppressed the Roman Catholic Church. You know that Russia has the Greek Church. The Government would not allow the Roman Church to hold its services. I am a Roman Catholic, and so I left the country."

"You are not a Nihilist!"

"No; none of the Poles are. If a Pole were to join the Nihilists, he would be disowned by his friends."

"Do you think the Nihilists killed the Czar?"

"Yes; of course. The Nihilists belong to the nobility as well as to other classes. They hate the Czar because he has oppressed them."

"Do you think the assassination of the Czar will do Russia any good?"

"God knows," said Mr. Sawitzky, with a peculiar Polish shrug; but I do think that his death will hasten on the revolution which is bound to come in Russia. The people can't stand the oppression of their rulers. Alexander Romanoff died a violent death; every Russian ruler since Peter I. has died a bloody death. They are a bloody set, and they die in blood."

Here Mr. Sawitzky was called away to attend to his business. He told the reporter he had sent to Chicago to get a Polish book on the oppression to which the Poles were subject, and he would like to translate some portions of the book and give the newspapers some points. "You can't believe the Russian papers," said he, "they tell lies. They do not dare to tell the truth about what the Government does."

—The property of Binghamton College has been sold for $25,500 to finish up McNerney of the Albany Diocese of the Catholic Church; for the use of St. Mary's Orphans' Home, and the college year has accordingly come to a premature close, much to the disappointment of the graduating class, who had made all their arrangements for their Commencement.

—"Pa, what is a Jesuit?" "Well, Jim, it is a man who—who—I'll tell you what it is, Jim, it's a man who—who—Jesuit? Why, Jim, a Jesuit is a man who—who—Jesuit? Why, Jim, a Jesuit is a man who—who—Jesuit? Why, Jim, a Jesuit is is no need, we repeat, to argue the matter. The duty of Irishmen is simply to denounce as a murderous design any State-aided plan whatever for further reducing the population of their country by emigration.

THE IRISH EXODUS.

It remains to say, what we have often said before, but what cannot under present circumstances be too often repeated—namely that the cause of the present exodus is to be found in and that that cause will not cease to operate while landlordism flourishes as it does at present. It is unpatriotic to leave one's country, but it is hard, at the same time, to be condemned at home to lasting misery; and therefore, as long as Irish tenants are reckonted to starvation-point, and tyrannised over by the lords of the soil and their agents and bailiffs until life becomes insupportable, ? en will be found to seek the free air of other lands, where industry is allowed to meet with its reward. The remedy, then, for this bleeding to death is a radical land law reform; to stay the exodus a stop must be put to rackrents and capricious evictions. For the rest, we have a strong hope that the exterminators will, in the long run, be foiled in their infernous efforts by the present agitation.

The cry swells loud from shore to shore—
From ma'nd vale to mountain hoar
From altar high to market-place—
They shall not go, the ancient race!

Wheat and Tonnage.

If the Associated Press dispatches of April 14 be correct, there were at that date 480,000 tons of wheat in the State. From this, there should be deducted 40,000 tons for consumption for the balance of the business year, leaving 560,000 tons as a surplus. On the 1st of April, there was in harbor, on the way, and loading, tonnage sufficient to carry away 480,000 tons. All this would be here in about five months, that is, by the close of August, leaving us at that date with a surplus from the old crop of about 80,000 tons. Suppose that all the vessels arrived in proportionate order, that is, one-fifth each month, we would have 320,000 tons by July 1st, while our surplus stock would be 240,000 tons. On the way there would probably be at least the same amount as now, that is, enough to carry 600,000 tons, not counting vessels in harbor, as included in the 320,000 tons.

Arrivals of new wheat by the close of August, would, with a surplus of a million tons, be say 120,000 tons. We would then have unprovided for in San Francisco, 200,000 tons, with probably supply enough to carry 400,000 tons, on the way and loading for this port. At the close of October, there would have arrived, say 160,000 tons more of new wheat, while the tonnage arriving would be about the same, leaving a surplus stock in San Francisco the same as before. And this state of things would, on previous assumption, continue thus for many months more.

All this, however, is based on the supposition that the tonnage on the way would be no larger than it is now; this, however, is not at all likely to be the case. It is probable that we shall have a much larger tonnage 2d 3s. 6d. can stand long. The news that these rates are asked, and in some instances obtained, will speed on to send the hearing fleet this way that we have ever known, and during the next three months, vessels in unwonted numbers will head this way from every part of the civilized world. In the latter part of the present year freights will be a great deal lower than they now are, and the tendency upward will be in that direction.

The prospects of foreign crops are such as to leave us to expect that prices will be pretty firmly sustained throughout the year, except for the month or two after the opening of harvest, when they are always somewhat lower. Prices in San Francisco, with that exception, will probably be sustained and advanced, according as freights go down and it will be worth while to hold wheat during June and July for the high prices that will come afterwards. A considerable quantity will, no doubt, be sold by the farmers and others who must have money, and whose needs are urgent; but others, not being necessitated to follow suit, can, if they should, in the event of any low figures being offered, hold on.—*S. Canonization of a Franciscan Father.

ROME, March 28.

On Sunday, 27th, the solemn ceremony of the promulgation and publication of three decrees of the Sacred Congregation of Rites took place in the presence of his Holiness Leo XIII. The first decree read has reference to the process of canonization of the Blessed John Baptist de Rossi, Canon of the Basilica of St. Mary in Cosmedin, the second and third decrees referred to the Beatification—"Tutoprocedi" pose ad Beatificationem"—of the venerable servants of God, Umile of Bisignano and Benignous of Cuneo, the former a lay brother, the latter a priest, of the order of St. Francis. At half-past eleven o'clock his Holiness, accompanied by his noble guard and several bishops, entered the Throne Hall. The following cardinals occupied seats on the right and left of the throne:—Cardinal Hilio, Protector of the Franciscan Order and Promoter of the beatification of Ven. Benignus; Cardinal Ledochowski, Promoter of the Canonization of Blessed John De Rossi; Cardinal Bartolini, Prefect of Congregation of Rites and Promoter of the beatification of Ven. Umile; Cardinal Monacto, L. Valetta, Cardinal Serafin, and Cardinal Randi. Kneeling before his Holiness were the Most Rev. Monsignore Isnimi and Crostirone; the Most Rev. Fathers Bernardine of Portugharo, General of the Franciscan Order, and Rev. Father Vincent of Jenne, Postulator for the Beatification of S.S. Umile and Benignus. After the reading of the decrees by the Most Rev. Secretary of the Congregation of Rites, his Eminence Cardinal Monaco Le Valetta, on the part of the Chapter of St. Mary in Cosmedin and of the Hospice of the Trinita dei Pellegrini, thanked his Holiness for the decree in the cause of the Blessed John De Rossi. Then the Most Rev. Father Bernardine addressed to his Holiness a most touching expression of the grateful feelings which animated the whole Franciscan Order on the auspicious occasion, and briefly sketched the lives of the two Franciscans, whose heroic virtues had been long examined by the Sacred Congregation and were now approved by the infallible authority of the Head of Christ. His Holiness, before imparting the Apostolic Benediction, delivered a short exhortation, dwelling on the necessity, in this age of pride and luxury, of following the example of the seraphic saint, St. Francis.

Market Report.

Domestic Produce Market.

MONTHLY OFFICE, April 28, 1881.

FLOUR—City Mills Superfine, $5 87½@ $6 87½; Bakers' and Family, $4 87½@$5; best Family Flour, extra, jobbing at $5 12½; Oregon Standard, extra, $4 87½; Oregon Superfine, $3 87½@$4 12½; Walla Walla extra, $4 87½; Interior extra, $4 75@$4 87½; Interior Superfine, $3 87½@$4 12½ ℔ bbl.

WHEAT—The market to-day was stagnant, there being no demand of any consequence from any quarter, and sales were slim. The freight market continues so high and ships so scarce that much business is impossible. Sales reported today were 600 and 300 sks, No. 2, $1 56, and 300 sks off grade $1 12½. No. 1 is quotable at $1 60@1 62½, outside figures for choice milling, and No. 2 at $1 52½@$1 57½ ℔ ctl.

BARLEY—Feed was very active to-day at full figures, and sales were larger than for some time. Brewing sold at top prices. The market is firm. Sales reported to-day were: 100 tons choice brewing, $1 20; 200 sks Chevalier, $1 12½; 3,000 sks bay feed, 90c; 50 sks bright feed, 95c; 1,000 sks fair do, 85c, and 750 and 300 sks do, 82½. Wrinkled Faces.

It is a painful sight to see young ladies in their teens with wrinkled and premature old faces; nevertheless it is quite common, and is any one who observes the tendency of the times the reason is very apparent. Judge from the advertisements and begin certificates, in which are used the names of eminent physicians and chemists, the unsuspecting and credulous have been induced to use some of the so-called liquid beautifiers, all of which are known to be positively injurious, and if used for any length of time will destroy the complexion, so that it will be next to impossible to restore it. Mothers should be very careful to see that their daughters do not use these preparations, but ask for and obtain Sweet's Harmless Vesuvin Face Powder, the only harmless beautifier. For sale by all druggists.

Poetry.

(FOR THE MONITOR.)

PATRICK SULLAN.

(A few days ago T. P. O'Connor, M. P., in the House of Commons, said that the Chief Secretary, he (Parnell) knew, was better aware than any other man of the condition of Ireland. The Chief Secretary, Mr. Forster, and Mr. Bessie, were Quakers, a man named O'Brady, who was Sub-Inspector of Police, and a man named Sullivan, a Protestant Gentleman, in the Parish of Patrick Sullan, Dublin, and when he died and laid out in the open air on the table, and wailing, upon seeing this, he placed his pistols on the dead body of Patrick Sullan.)

He had passed from the pale of earthly law,
His soul had left the world of woe,
No more his foot would press the soil
That his father's fathers trod,
And his friends had in reverence gathered round,
The last and rites to pay,
When the bailiffs entered the humble cot
Where Patrick Sullan lay.

When thrown in the majesty of Death,
The brave heart cold and still,
Lay the man who had suffered want and pain,
And seen and grievous ill,
Who had toiled through the storm and frost and sun
From morn till evening late,
Who had starved himself to meet the rent,
But the task was all too great.

And so the Christian nobleman, whose coffers overflow
With gold stained with his brothers' blood,
And dim with the tears of woe,
His fields sent out on their hellish task,
And they came in the morning, fair,
To the little cot where that still form lay,
For the Angel of Death was there.

And then O God, can this be true?
Oh, they were fiends—not men,
They had the power on that hort
Which never would test again.
And their mission over, they took their way,
Without one pang—one thought,
Of the widow and the orphan—one
Whose ruin they had wrought.

Oh, men of Ireland, are ye dumb?
Have ye no voice to speak?
To cry to the world of these awful crimes
Against your dead and your poor and weak?
Oh, thyself landlord, turn in shame—
To the land law—the land law—
There is a mightier power than yours,
And to Him belongs the dead.

Oakland, Cal. KATE E. QUINN.

The Home Rulers Formally Resolve Upon a Course of Action.

LONDON, May 5.—The Parnellites tonight, by a vote of 17 to 16, adopted a resolution to abstain from voting on the second reading of the Land bill and to leave the House in a body when a division is called. It is said that Parnell has offered the resolution and that A. M. Sullivan seconded it, and that it was adopted upon Parnell declaring that if it was not adopted he would resign the leadership. O'Connor Power refused to vote on the resolution. The discussion was stormy one. The Standard says Sullivan has written Parnell, declaring any longer to acknowledge his authority. It is thought that others will follow his example. It is said that the rupture in the Parnellite camp is complete. The Times says "Parnell's letter accepted Parnell's resolution. The minority against the resolution were Daly, O'Shaughnessy, Sullivan, McCoan, Lyons, Kelly, Lane, Finigan, Sutchuck, Marum, McCarthy, Macfarlane, and John O'Connor Power, while Richard Power, O'Shea and Dolan abstained from voting."

DIRECTIONS TO THE LAND BILL.

LONDON, May 5.—In the House of Commons to-day, Gladstone moved the second reading of the Land bill. Parnell's amendment opposing the second reading of the Land bill declares that the bill, in its present state, would fail to secure to tenant farmers such reduction in rents as would afford adequate protection to their property in holdings; would have evicted or rack-rented tenants in a defenseless position, and offers no guarantee of the creation of a sufficient number of occupying owners to check a monopoly in land, or make available for the laboring population any of the large area of cultivated land from which the former occupiers were unjustly evicted.

ILLNESS OF DILLON.

Dillon is ill. He will be removed to an infirmary to-day. There is no cause for anxiety regarding his condition. The statement that Dillon would resign his seat in the Commons is groundless. He at first intended to resign, but he will be left for decision to the Executive Committee of the Land League.

LONDON, May 6.—It is stated that Sullivan has written Parnell, declining any longer to acknowledge the latter's authority.

DUBLIN, May 6.—Brennan, Secretary to the Land League, has started for London, and will return on Sunday.

LONDON, May 6.—A. M. Sullivan had a long interview with Parnell last night, but declined to refrain from voting on the Land bill. Probably 40 Home Rulers will vote on the second reading of the bill, and 25 absent.

Cork and Kilkenny are proclaimed under the Arms Act; also King's and Queen's counties.

RADICAL LAND AGITATION.

NEW YORK, May 8.—A cable special says The London Times expect that the new leadership of the Marquis of Salisbury will lead to more vigorous action on the part of the Conservative party than has been expected for some time. The agitation about the land question will also be more active in both countries. The Radical policy is gaining great headway not only in Ireland but throughout England. Irish Home Rule members hold a caucus to-morrow and decide upon the course they will pursue, but apart from them it is clear that the moderate Home Rulers, of whom Mr. Shaw is the head, represent the best element of the Irish people.

DIVISIONS IN THE IRISH CAMP.

The Irish Land bill drags heavily. The vote on the second reading is not expected until the 16th inst. The more the debate is prolonged the greater are the divisions which arise in the Irish camp. O'Connor Power has declared, in an excellent speech, that he will vote for the second reading. A. M. Sullivan has seceded from the party. Mr. Parnell became 120 latter advised the Irish members to abstain from voting. Mr. Parnell was impelled to this step by the action of Mr. Dillon, which worked the Parnellites' considerable great anger. The proclamation of the city of Dublin arises from the discovery of a suppressed Fenian conspiracy in Dublin, followed by an outrage. Mr. Dillon was arrested for his furious Clonmel speech. Mr. Parnell's followers professed extreme irritation at the act, and so by a vote of 17 to 12 they decided not to vote for the second reading of the land bill, in order to weaken the Government majority. Many protests have come from Ireland against Mr. Parnell's proposal, and a change of front may be expected. The Whigs will not oppose the second reading of the Land bill, but will join the Conservatives in obtaining modifications.

IN THE COMMONS.

In the House of Commons last night a motion was agreed to that the House thinks something should be done to improve the dwellings of laborers in Ireland.

Forster, Chief Secretary for Ireland, stated that if the Government could see any way of proposing anything to effect that object of the motion of the Land bill, it would gladly do so.

DELAY OVER THE LAND BILL.

CHICAGO, May 5.—A Times London cable special says: The Land Leaguers are not pleased over the delay in the discussion of the land measure. The parties seem engaged principally in skirmishing, each other rather than in attempting to Irish affairs. When the bill is up for discussion no interest seems to be excited and the debate has come reduced to a minimum, there being a Home Rule party of 65 members, and a decrimination between the two parties, as in the case of the Bradlaugh matter and Dillon's arrest. The Times says: "The public is somewhat at a loss to understand the Home Rule stormy one. The Standard says Sullivan has written Parnell, declaring any longer to acknowledge his authority. It is thought that others will follow his example. It is said that the rupture in the Parnellite camp is complete. The Times says "Parnell's letter accepted Parnell's resolution. DIRECTIONS TO THE LAND BILL.

LONDON, May 5.—In the House of Commons to-day, Gladstone moved the second reading of the Land bill. Parnell's amendment opposing the second reading of the Land bill declares that the bill, in its present state, would fail to secure to tenant farmers such reduction in rents as would afford adequate protection to their property in holdings; would have evicted or rack-rented tenants in a defenseless position, and offers no guarantee of the creation of a sufficient number of occupying owners to check a monopoly in land, or make available for the laboring population any of the large area of cultivated land from which the former occupiers were unjustly evicted.

ILLNESS OF DILLON.

Dillon is ill. He will be removed to an infirmary to-day. There is no cause for anxiety regarding his condition. The statement that Dillon would resign his seat in the Commons is groundless. He at first intended to resign, but he will be left for decision to the Executive Committee of the Land League.

LONDON, May 6.—It is stated that Sullivan has written Parnell, declining any longer to acknowledge the latter's authority.

DUBLIN, May 6.—Brennan, Secretary to the Land League, has started for London, and will return on Sunday.

LONDON, May 6.—A. M. Sullivan had a long interview with Parnell last night, but declined to refrain from voting on the Land bill. Probably 40 Home Rulers will vote on the second reading of the bill, and 25 absent.

Cork and Kilkenny are proclaimed under the Arms Act; also King's and Queen's counties.

MAN'S MORTALITY.

[The following beautiful poem is justly considered a literary gem of the highest order. The original is from the pen of Henry Colley, Dublin. They found it in a book that the poem was written by one of the sweetest Christian bards in the reign of King Richard, the last, and was sung or chanted at the 4 grand assembly of knights, chivalrous and bards ever held in the famous halls of Tara. The trans. also is by the learned Dr. O'Donovan.]

Like a damask rose you see,
Or like a blossom on a tree,
Or like the dainty flowers in May,
Or like the morning to the day,
Or like the sun, or like the shade,
Or like the gourd which Jonah had,
Even such is man, whose throne is grass,
Dry as cut and out, and so is done.
The rose withers, the blossom blasteth,
The flower fades, the morning hasteth,
The sun sets, the shadow flies,
The gourd consumes, the man—he dies.

Like the grass that's newly sprung,
Or like the tale that's new begun,
Or like the bird that's here to day,
Or like the pearled dew in May,
Or like the singing of the swan—
Even such is man, who lives by breath,
Is here, now there, in life and death.
The grass withers, the tale is ended,
The bird is flown, the dew ascended,
The hour is short, the span not long,
Too swift's near death, man's life is done.

Like the bubble in the brook,
Or like a glass, or like a lock,
Or like the shuttle in a weaver's hand,
Or like the writing on the sand,
Or like a thought, or like a dream,
Or like the gliding of the stream,
Even such is man, who lives by breath,
Is here, now there, in life or death.
The bubble's out, the look's forgot,
The shuttle flung, the writing's blot,
The thought is past, the dream is gone,
The waters glide, man's life is done.

Like to an arrow from the bow,
Or like swift course of water flow,
Or like that time twixt food or sib,
Or like the spider's tender web,
Or like a spear, or like a spell,
Or like the dealing of a dole,
Even such is man, whose brittle state
Is always subject unto fate.
The arrow shot, the flood soon spent,
The time no time, the web soon rent,
The race is run, the goal soon won,
The dole soon dealt, man's life is done.

Like to the lightning in the sky,
Or like a post that quick doth fly,
Or like a quaver in a song,
Or like a journey three days long,
Or like snow when summer's gone,
Or like a pear, or like a plum,
Even such is man, who lasts no sorrow,
Lives but this day, and dies to-morrow.
The lightning's past, the post must on,
The song is short, the journey so,
The pear is ripe, the plum doth fall,
The snow dissolves, and so must all.

Literary Miscellany.

The Fatal Birthday.

A Tale Founded on Fact.

A few weeks after the disastrous expedition of Quiberon, and while the numerous prisoners who had fallen into the hands of the Republicans were being daily led from the little town of Auray to die under the bullets of their remorseless enemies, a young Royalist, who had escaped, had rented a house in this same town of Auray. He was an officer of the Royal Guards, and had served in the army of Condé. He was a handsome young man, with a pleasing countenance, and his manners were those of a gentleman. He was the only child of his mother, who was a widow, and was her all in this world. Her husband had been killed in the first battle he had fought in, and she had lost her only daughter in the terrible massacres of Nantes. Her son was all that was left to her, and he was her idol. He was her companion, and she was his confidant. Their age and misfortunes had drawn them closer to each other than ordinary circumstances would have done, and they had lived together in the most perfect harmony. The young man had spent his fortune in the service of his king, and his mother had parted with the last portion of her dowry to purchase for him the post he now held in the famous halls of Tara. The trats. also is by the learned Dr. O'Donovan.]

Their age seemed to be the same.

"Hermanie" he exclaimed. "Why do you risk your safety by coming again so soon? Your presence may be discovered."

"True, brother," replied the girl in a low whisper; "but I could not let this day, our birthday, pass without seeing you. We are both nineteen, and it is for the first time in our lives we have found ourselves separated on this feast day. Besides, Hyacinth, I have been so dull and uneasy all day. I could bear it no longer, so I came to see if you were safe and well.

"Both safe and well, as you see," answered her brother, smiling as he fondly pressed the little white hand she had passed through the bars. "Do you remember how our dear mother used to say that we two always had the same thoughts and feelings! Well, all this day I have been sad and downcast, because you have been so, I suppose. So now try and be cheerful, Hermanie, or I must be dull too."

"Do they continue to treat you kindly?" inquired the girl anxiously.

"Yes, I have everything I want, except my liberty. Really, I feel ashamed to be so well off while my former companions remain in misery."

"This is not your fault, my poor Hyacinth!"

"No, only the fault of my talent. By the way, I wonder what the Commandant makes me paint next! His portrait is all but finished. Can you see it through the window?

Hermanie stood on tip-toe, and shading her eyes with her hand looked in.

"It is the very image of him!" she exclaimed, and might shudder she added, "but I do dislike the face so much."

"When you take a portrait you must copy nature," said her brother smiling; "but, hush! I hear footsteps! Good-bye, sister dear, —my one next birthday be a happier one!"

She glided quickly from the window, crossed the solitary yard into which it looked and made her exit by a broken-down wall which ran along one side. Hyacinth threw himself into a chair. The next minute the door opened and the General came in. After exchanging a friendly greeting with his prisoner, he walked towards the easel.

"Upon my word, St. Florent," he said in a self-satisfied tone, "that is quite a flattering picture!"

"I am glad you think so," replied the young artist.

"But you have not finished the coat! That is the worst of you men of genius, you are always lazy. I do believe you have done nothing to it since yesterday."

"I can finish it in half an hour," answered Hyacinth. "I will set to work early to-morrow."

"But I want it done to-night," replied the other, impatiently.

"To night! The light is not good for painting at this hour."

"Nonsense! It is quite bright near the window. It is scarcely six o'clock, and this is the third of August. Why, we shall have light for the next two hours. Come, there's no time to lose! Sit down, and commence, that's a good fellow! I want to show it to some friends this evening, and I promised to be back with them in half an hour."

"Some are on the table, the rest in that drawer. I have been touching them up."

"That's right." Then suddenly changing the subject as carelessly as he said it, "You seem to be a great favorite with the officers on my staff, and especially with Oberon!"

"He is very kind to me," replied Hyacinth, without raising his eyes from his painting.

"He says that you told him to-day was your birthday. How old are you?"

"Nineteen."

"Young enough to look forward to a long life."

"I do not know," answered the prisoner, sadly.

"Youth is no guarantee for life in these days. You know the saying: 'In peace sons bury their fathers, in war fathers bury their sons.' But all my relations are gone, so most probably strangers will bury me."

"Decidedly, St. Florent, you are in a melancholy humor to-night. You must come down with us to celebrate your birthday."

Hyacinth thanked the General, and then there followed a long interval of silence; at length throwing down his brush he exclaimed,

"There! It is done."

"You have forgotten to sign your name."

"Oh! Do you care for it?"

"Of course I do, it will always put me in mind of you."

There was something peculiar in the manner in which the General spoke these last words; a thought darted through the captive's mind. Perhaps he was just going to receive his liberty, and hence the General's haste to have the portrait finished. His heart beat at the idea. Liberty! How Hermanie would rejoice! Already he fancied himself returning with his dear twin-sister to their old Breton home, there to await away the tedious hours of his captivity by sketching the likenesses of his friends in misfortune; or calling on his memory to reproduce the Breton scenery in the midst of which his childhood had been passed. Those drawings, done with such rude materials as the place afforded, attracted the attention of the Republican general to whom the superintendence of the daily executions had been entrusted. Wishing to obtain views of the town and its environs, he made the young artist accompany him on two or three occasions to take the desired sketches; then apparently charmed by the amiable manners of Hyacinth, with perhaps some pity for his extreme youth, he removed him to his own house, where, while he had him sufficiently guarded to prevent any attempt to escape, he at the same time showed him every kindness, and frequently invited him to dine at his own table. Although Hyacinth had too much experience of the wretched, overcrowded prison of Auray not to be fully sensible of the improvement in his condition, and although the prospect of being spared an ignominious death was certainly not without attraction to one so young, he was, nevertheless, when he thought of the brave companions he had left behind him, subject since his removal to the general's house, to frequent fits of depression. At such moments he would almost reproach himself with the strange fortune that had separated his lot from theirs. On the afternoon in question he was even more than usually restless and low spirited; he had walked several times to and fro in the room, when he stopped suddenly. A slight sound had attracted his attention, a sound which was familiar to him. He moved quickly to the window. The face of a beautiful girl appeared on the other side of the bars. She bore so close a resemblance to the youthful captive that no one could have hesitated a moment in pronouncing them to be brother and sister. Their age seemed to be the same.

"Hermanie" he exclaimed. "Why do you risk your safety by coming again so soon? Your presence may be discovered."

"True, brother," replied the girl in a low whisper; "but I could not let this day, our birthday, pass without seeing you. four maillots with loaded muskets entered the apartment.

"Surely," exclaimed Oberon indignantly, "you cannot mean to have a man shot whom we have all treated as a friend, and whom you yourself have taken such kindly interest. Surely it would have been less cruel to have left him in prison than to have him any hopes that were not to be realized."

"If St. Florent deceived himself it was his own look out. I, at least, gave him any promise of protection from the law."

Several of the Republican officers joined Oberon in soliciting the life of the young Royalist, but the General remained inexorable. Hyacinth stood up:

"I do not ask," he said calmly, "any difference to be made between me and my companions; since royalty is a crime, I am as guilty as they are. But I do demand a short time to recollect myself before I pass from a banquet to death."

"A soldier, and not ready to die!" said the General, sarcastically.

"You are right," answered the young man nobly; "a Christian and a soldier should always be prepared for death." Then turning to the soldiers charged with his execution he said: "I am ready!" and moved towards the door. It was a bright moonlight night, the soldiers defaced their prisoner against a blank wall which formed one side of the yard and then withdrew a few paces. The General stood at the open window of the dining-room to watch the scene. Suddenly a figure, which had been crouching under the window of the room occupied by the captive sprang forward, darted across the yard, and threw its arms round the neck of the victim.

"Hermanie, is it you?" murmured Hyacinth, as he tried to detach himself from her embrace.

The soldiers, startled by the suddenness of the apparition, hesitated what to do.

"Fire!" cried the girl; "if my brother is to die, let me die with him."

The visit which Hermanie had paid that afternoon to her brother had suggested the strange presentiment which she felt about his fate; when the old aunt with whom she resided—for she was an orphan—had retired to rest, she quickly left the house and stole up to the well-known window; she heard sounds of mirth in the dining-hall above, from which streamed a brilliant light; at times she could discern her brother's voice. Taking up her station close under the wall of the house she determined to await his safe return to his room, and thus it was that now she saw him led forth to die.

One of the officers succeeded in separating the girl from her brother, and drew her to a distance.

"Fire!" exclaimed the young royalist. It was the last time his voice sounded in his sister's ear: the next moment the ominous discharge of four muskets had ended the life of Count Hyacinth de St. Florent.

THE SLEEPING HUNGARIAN.

Giving Indications of Wakefulness After a Sleep of Seventy-one Days.

PHILADELPHIA, April 22.—A despatch to the Times from Allentown says: "The long and excited interest manifested in the case of John Gyumbere, the sleeping Hungarian in the Lehigh County Almshouse, was still manifested yesterday. He was visited by a number of his visitors and his attendant, and appearing to those present to be in a profound sleep, he suddenly began to rub his eyes and soon afterward opened them. He then raised himself in a sitting posture in bed without any assistance, in which position he remained for about five minutes, rubbing his body and arms and looking with a natural and lifelike expression at those standing around him. There was a sudden hush in the room, and every eye was turned upon him. All waited to see whether he would speak or make a demand for anything. He said nothing, however, and at the expiration of the five minutes, without uttering a word or making any unusual gestures, he again laid down of his own accord, closed his eyes, and commenced his slumber the same as he had done for the last seventy-one days. After the patient had partaken of a light breakfast a change again took place. He raised himself in bed, opened his eyes and walked to a chair in the room and sat down. The superintendent, Mr. Henninger, was summoned to his side and used all efforts to converse with him; but, for want of a knowledge of the Hungarian language, failed in his undertaking. Seeing that a change was about to take place in the patient's condition, that his ruddy complexion, which he had maintained all along, was changed into that of a pale and death-like one, and that the patient was suddenly becoming very weak, Dr. Erdman, the attending physician, was summoned, who found the man, much to his surprise, in a wakeful state and very weak, in which condition he remained a little hour this evening. The doctor's opinion of the case is that if his brain is in a healthy state a speedy recovery may be looked for."

Polish Peasants Swear Allegiance Only Before Their Priests.

Who has not heard of the sufferings of those Polish peasants of Podlachia who were converted from Catholicity to Schismatic-ism by shot and shell and other equally approved applianses! It was thought that, inasmuch as nothing further had been heard of resistance in that quarter, the Unites had become faithful schismatics. The recent change in the tenure of the Russian throne has shown that such is not the case. The peasants of Podlachia were called upon to take the oath of allegiance to the new Czar before a schismatic Pope. They refused, saying that they had sworn allegiance to Alexander II. before Catholic priests, and would not take the oath to Alexander III. otherwise than in presence of Catholic priests. The Governor of Siedlce thereupon proposed as a compromise that they should take the oath without the presence of a priest of any sort. This also they staunchly refused to do, and so the governor was compelled to send for Catholic priests from Western Poland to have the oath administered to men who are officially returned as "members of the Orthodox

A Bishop's Profession of Faith.

The Right Rev. John Ireland, Coadjutor Bishop of St. Paul, Minnesota, sent to a daily paper in his episcopal city a letter, in which occurred this declaration: "As an American citizen, for the safety of the commonwealth, I am willing myself to pay taxes, so that no child shall grow up among us without the essential elements of knowledge, and I make profession of faith in the right of the State to levy taxes for such purposes."

Disraeli.

Sketch of His Eventful Life.

FROM OBSCURITY TO EMINENCE

Disraeli and O'Connell.

His Works, His Wife, His Success Sketch of the Tory Chief.

Benjamin Disraeli, (Lord Beaconsfield), one of England's leading statesmen, who died at his residence in London on Tuesday morning, April 19th, was the son of Isaac Disraeli, an English author, a descendant of a family of Spanish Jews. He (Benjamin), was born at Islington, London, in 1805. After an education at a private school, he was placed in an attorney's office, where he continued for some time as a preparation to an appointment in a Government office, which, however, he did not obtain. In 1826 he became a contributor to a paper started in the Tory interests, and called The Representative. This paper lived only five months, but it seemed to have had some effect upon the mind of Mr. Disraeli, for he set to work upon it a political bias. In 1828 appeared his novel of "Vivian Grey," which was at various times succeeded by "Contarini Fleming," "The Young Duke," "The Wondrous Tale of Alroy," "The Rise of Iskander," "Henrietta Temple," "Venetia," "Coningsby," "The Sibyl," and "Tancred." Beside these, he produced, in 1834, a quarto poem entitled "The Revolutionary Epic" and in 1836, "Alarcos, a Tragedy." He also wrote some pamphlets and a biography of Lord George Bentinck. While thus actively engaged in the world of letters, he was continually before the public as a politician. In this character, he did not figure as satisfactorily as in that of a writer of fiction. In 1837, after many defeats, he was returned member from Maidstone. His first speech in the House was like his first attempts at political representation—a complete failure. His speech was laughed at throughout, and he was compelled to sit down before it was finished. This, however, he did not do until he had said, "I have begun several things many times, and often have succeeded at last. I shall sit down now, but the time will come when you will hear me." These words proved prophetic. The time did come when he was listened to with anxious eagerness. By his marriage with the wealthy widow of Mr. Lewis, who had been his colleague in the representation from Maidstone, he became independent in pecuniary matters. In 1841 he was recognized as the leader of the Tory party in the House of Commons. In 1844 he became Chancellor of the Exchequer, under Lord Derby, but in the same year that administration fell upon his own budget. In 1848 Lord Derby again came into power, and Mr. Disraeli was again appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer, and in 1859 introduced a measure of Parliamentary reform, the rejection of which led to the resignation of the Ministry. On the return of the Earl of Derby to power in 1866, Mr. Disraeli resumed his position as Chancellor of the Exchequer, and carried the Reform Act of 1867. The Earl's health failing, he retired in February, 1868, and Mr. Disraeli succeeded him as Premier, and his wife was created a Peeress as Viscountess Beaconsfield. The Ministry resigned the following December, but Mr. Disraeli returned to power in 1847. In 1876 he was raised to the Peerage as Earl Beaconsfield. His party having suffered defeat by the general election of 1880, he resigned office.

DISRAELI AND O'CONNELL—THAT "CHAINLESS."

When Disraeli entered Parliament O'Connell just entered upon his alliance with the Whigs. In their despair of being able to maintain their hold on office and its emoluments by other means they had sought the support of the "Liberator" and his following, and he, knowing that nothing was likely to be obtained from any other party, had accepted their overtures. In a speech which he made during the election he animadverted in no very gentle terms upon the defection of the Irish chieftain. The quarrel between O'Connell and Disraeli which followed is among the most amusing episodes of political history. In his Taunton speech the latter called his opponent an "incendiary" and a "traitor," and in reply O'Connell delivered one of those addresses which delighted the idolators of the "Liberator." He said he had enough to style his opponent "a liar" and to say that his life was a "living lie." There was a good deal more of the same sort, and in the end he described his opponent as possessing "just the qualities of the impenitent thief, whose name," he added, "I rarely believe, must have been Disraeli. For aught I know," he went on, "the present Disraeli is descended from him, and with the impression that he is, I now forgive the heir-at-law of the blasphemous thief who died upon the cross." Just at this time Lord Alvanley, smarting under one of the Irish orator's fiercest rhetorical castigations, had

"CALLED OUT" THE "LIBERATOR."

O'Connell, who had already "killed his man," refused the challenge, but it was taken up by his son, Morgan O'Connell, the honorable member for Montmorency, who had already "killed his man" in a duel on the Continent. The affair came off in Battersea Fields, and the young Tribune, who was a crack shot, fired his pistol in the air. Lord Alvanley, who was a good shot, and who, it was said, could have "put a bullet through a sixpence at twenty paces," fired his pistol in the ground, and the affair was considered to be "honorable to both parties." Disraeli, however, sulked upon his dignity, and refused to accept the explanation. The quarrel was thus left open, and Disraeli, who was a fair shot, and who had been a member of the Household Brigade, was considered to be "bound to fight." Our Young Folks.

Children's Work.

No woman who has "been through the mill," seriously considers the work of small children as help in the household. Men sometimes have to long under delusion. We teach the little ones to work, and we call it "helping mamma," for their own education, and in the hope that when practice has made them somewhere near perfect in their tasks they will really be helpers.

But if they are genuine children, with the life and buoyancy that belong rightfully to childhood, they do not put their minds upon their tasks long at a time, and it becomes very wearisome to keep reminding and hurrying them. Children are said to be "careless," but who have a better right to be free from care? Little by little we must teach them to carry responsibilities and cares, but the child on whose face care sits habitually, is a pitiful sight.

A mother who was recently complimented because her boy of ten was "such a little man" about helping her, replied sadly:

"He is a good boy, and I do not know what I should do without him, but I feel sad every day because he has to work so. I feel as though I am defrauding him of his childhood. He never can be a little child again, and it lies with me to make him one with so many tasks."

Do farmers expect any real work from their small colts and calves? Children under eight years of age, who do all of the table setting, dish washing, and sweeping regularly, are very remarkable children, and we do not see how one could more to a woman who trains her children to do this work while so young, ought not to have much other care or labor, because she task of training children to work—the nerve or firmness to hold them straight to the task—is itself so arduous.

Tab's Doll.

On the curbstone on Brush street, one day last summer, sat a girl of nine or ten years of age, full in the hot sun, but she was so busy with a wee bundle of cloth that she seemed not to mind the heat and glare. One arm had been torn from the poor "baby," its head fell over on one side, and the sawdust ran from its dilapidated left every time that it was lifted about.

As the child sat there trying to make "baby" whole again with an old darning needle that he wield with a boy of fourteen stopped on the walk, and sneeringly said:

"That doll's been sunstruck, and all the doctors in town can't save her life."

The girl made no reply, and after a moment the lad advanced, snatched the doll, and flung it high over his head, laughing loudly at her efforts to prevent him.

"Is your mother dead?" asked the girl, as her eyes filled with tears, and her chin quivered.

"Not as I knows of."

"Well, mine is; and she made that doll for me when her hands trembled so much and her eyes had so many tears in them that I had to cut the cloth for her. That's why my baby looks so bad."

"Where" whistled the boy below his breath; and walking into the street, and picking up and carefully testing the plaything, he placed it in her hands as he said:

"I remember now 'bout seein' the crape on the door, and I'm sorry I made fun. Tab's tore limb! in my cap will make that baby a hull dress, and if you won't say nothin' to nobody of how I acted, I'll give it to you!"

Startling Scene in a Menagerie.

A lion tamer, a colored man named Alexander, was very near being torn to pieces by an infuriated lion during a performance in a menagerie at Birmingham, Eng., short time ago. The animal is a vicious one, and a few days ago had shockingly mangled one of the keepers, who had to amputate his arm. The lion after ward showed symptoms of resentment at the severe punishment the tamer was obliged to inflict upon him in that time and several times afterward. On Saturday afternoon, there was a great attendance, and the lion tamer gave two performances. The first was concluded in safety, but when the tamer made his second entry into the den the large lion sprang at him and had to be beaten back. While preceding cautiously to the cage, the tamer fortunately lifted his eyes from those of the lion, which was upon him immediately, and the shrieks of the immense crowd of spectators. Alexander was clawed on both sides of the face, struck to the ground, and bitten in the arm. The red hot irons were at once thrust between the bars, and the lion was dragged like an ox from beneath the lion, the blood streaming down his face and shoulder. He discharged his revolver three times in the lion's mouth, and, gaining his feet, placed his back against the side of the cage and attacked the animal with his loaded whip, laying it about him with such a fine and furious rage of defenceless hate, which he had been watched with breathless anxiety, lest as the lion turned left the den the crowd gave vent to their excited feeling by enthusiastic cheering him. He was not seriously injured.

Pretty Thoughts.

What is crime? A wretched vagabond travelling from place to place in fruitless endeavor to escape from justice; who is constantly engaged in his pursuit; a foe to virtue and happiness, though at times the compass of poor innocence, which is too often made to suffer for thoughtly.

What is thought? A fountain from which flows all good and evil intentions; a mental fluid, electrical in the force and rapidity of movements, silently flowing unseen within its omipotent avenue, yet it is the controlling power of all animated matter and the chief mainspring of all our actions.

What is happiness? A butterfly that roves from flower to flower in the vast garden of existence, and which is eagerly pursued by the multitude in vain hope of obtaining the prize, yet it continually eludes their grasp.

What is fashion? A beautiful envelope for mentality, presenting a glittering and polished exterior, the appearance of which gives no certain indication of the real value of what is contained therein.

What is wit? A sparkling beverage that is highly exhilarating and agreeable when partaken at the expense of others, but when used at our own cost it becomes bitter and unpleasant.

What is knowledge? A key that unravels all mysteries, which unlocks the entrance, and discovers new, unseen, and unrolledan paths in the hitherto unexplored field of science and literature.

What is fear? A frightful substance to the really guilty, but a vain and harmless shadow to the conscientious, honest and upright.

SUMMONS.
DEPARTMENT NO. 8 IN THE SUPERIOR COURT CITY AND COUNTY of San Francisco, State of California, MARY A. BOYLE, plaintiff, vs. CORNELIUS BOYLE, defendant. Action brought in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court, the object and general nature of which is to obtain a decree dissolving the bonds of matrimony hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days (irrespective of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons, if served within this County; or, if served elsewhere, within thirty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said Complaint. The said action is brought to obtain a decree of the bonds of matrimony now existing between said plaintiff and defendant, and decree that upon the grounds set out in the Complaint on file herein, to wit: Habitual drunkenness, that plaintiff be awarded the custody and control of the minor children, issue of said marriage, also that plaintiff have permanent alimony, together with Counsel fees, costs of suit and general relief. And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said Complaint as above required, the said Plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded herein. Given under my hand and seal of the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, this 22nd day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty one.
WILLIAM A. STUART, Clerk.
[SEAL OF COURT.]

ENTERTAINMENT OF THE EVA BRANCH OF THE LAND LEAGUE.

A large audience assembled at the Metropolitan Temple last night, attracted by the announcement that John Devoy, the distinguished Irish Nationalist, would lecture at the entertainment given by the Eva Branch. Mrs. Jerome Deasy introduced J. J. O'Brien, the Chairman of the evening, who said a few words on the necessity for Irishmen to work hand in hand together if they desired to see the green flag of old Erin once more wave over College Green.

Mrs. Richmond played a piece of music descriptive of Sheriff Dawson's rescue of the Fenian convicts from the Australian penal settlement. After Mrs. Richmond had responded to an encore the following programme was given and liberally applauded: Song, "Home Rule," M. C. McGinn; recitation, J. J. Tobin; piano solo, Mrs. Richmond; song, "Bonnie Jean," Mrs. Fanny Bender; recitation, "Erin's Flag," Mrs. M. J. Connor; song, "Dear Little Shamrock," Miss Eliza Walsh; piano solo, Mrs. Richmond.

John Devoy was introduced amid thundering applause, and prefaced his lecture by returning his thanks for the entertainment, and complimenting the performers in it. He then proceeded with his lecture, in the course of which he referred to "woman's work in connection with the movement," and said he looked upon every demonstration of the kind before him as an index of the strength of the Land League movement in the locality in which it took place, and showed that wherever the Irish ladies undertook they carried out. The Land League movement in Ireland had infused more life into all classes in Ireland than any previous movement, and had caused a feeling to spread that had been felt throughout the whole world. The devotion and enthusiasm of the Irish women to the cause of Irish liberty was never exceeded, as was shown by Ann Devlin and Sarah Curran. And coming down to a later period we find in the present national movement women with whom devotion to country was never equalled by any of their predecessors. The women of the present time had taken up a work for which they are much more fitted than the mere work of organizing. It was surprising the extent to which organization had been carried out. The work of the women would bear comparison with any work performed by the men, and if they continued for ten years longer in their work, not only would the Irish National Land League be successful, but Irish independence would be placed on a sure footing.

Tears and bloodshed, even to revolution, are within the possibilities of England within the next six months, and these women may not only be called upon to feed the fainting, but to bind up the wounds of their countrymen, who have shed their blood in the cause of their country; and even further, they might be forced into prisons by the British Government. But, said the speaker, I believe the women of Ireland are willing to bear even this. The speaker branded the speech of John Bright in endorsement of the emigration clause of the Land Bill as an infamous effort to snare off the final settlement of the question, and advised that all such speeches and the arguments they contained be refuted in and out of season. The speaker prophesied that the downfall of the British Empire was near at hand, but this could not be accomplished until the people of Ireland had passed through an ordeal of suffering and blood, and then Ireland would arise from the ruins of the British Empire a free nation.

The Nihilists Busy.

LONDON, May 6.—It is said the arrest of Grand Duke Constantine is likely to be followed by a Nihilist movement of sailors in the Russian fleet, who are said to have an understanding with a number of other Nihilists at Odessa. A Nihilist signal to the Russian Army has been widely circulated in St. Petersburg. It is thought the autocrat's principle is compared to a deterrent, despised and abandoned relative. The proclamation ends by calling on the army to rise and strike down the tyrant.

John Bright on Emigration.

LONDON, May 9.—The debate on the Land bill was adjourned until Thursday, after a speech by John Bright, in the course of which, defending the emigration clause of the bill, Bright said if the great fleet assembled at Cork or at Galway, offering free passage to the whole population of Ireland, it was probable all, certainly that half, would find their way to the United States, which opened their doors to everybody. He should be sorry to see them go, but though emigration would be a hardship to the parents, it meant the deliverance of the children from poverty and suffering.

Imposing Spectacle at the Marriage in Vienna.

VIENNA, May 10. The weather was cold, but not raining. At 11 o'clock the wedding procession started from the palace and proceeded to the church in the following order: Archduke and Archduchess Rudolph in a state carriage, followed by Prince Rudolph in the uniform of a Major-General. Then came the Emperor Francis Joseph, having on his right the King of the Belgians, both being in a General's uniform. Then came the bride, with the Empress of Austria and the Queen of the Belgians on either hand. The train of the three ladies were borne by the principal ladies in waiting. The Princess Stephanie wore a magnificent robe of cloth of silver, with an elaborate train in embroidered orange blossoms, arranged in branches, looping up the dress, and the veil was of Brussels lace, specially made for the occasion. Her mother, the Queen, wore a blue velvet dress trimmed with lace. The Empress wore a pale-gray dress trimmed with Brussels point lace. The trains of the foreign Princesses and the Archduchess were borne by pages and the ladies of the palace. Another group of officers completed the procession. The church of St. Augustine, where the marriage ceremony was performed, is the church of the Imperial household. An affecting incident occurred at the most solemn portion of the ceremony. The Princess, who had maintained her apparent composure up to that moment, now broke completely down, and burst forth into a fit of weeping, crying aloud and trembling with long suppressed nervous excitement. Prince Rudolph was calm and collected, and acted with uncommon good sense, and succeeded finally in calming the agitation of his bride. The fears and timidity of the Princess Stephanie had a marked effect upon the large attendance of royal and noble ladies, and caused many of them also to shed tears.

Eastern Markets.

A late New York Commercial says: We are informed by one of the most important persons in Chicago that Wall street has been bulling railroad stocks and bearing wheat, on the belief that there would be a large crop for 1881, instead of which it is short 20,000,000 bushels. Among the houses in Wall street named by our informant is Woerischer & Co., who are supposed to be short between 200,000 and 300,000 bushels on their account, having made a great deal of money in the past two years as bulls on stocks and bears on wheat. The stock of wheat at the other seaboard ports is equally light, as New York and Baltimore have only about 400,000 bushels, Philadelphia 117,000 bushels, and Boston about 75,000 bushels; stocks of cork, however, have increased during the past week 50,000 bushels at the seaboard, and there are between 5,000,000 and 6,000,000 bushels in Chicago. New York has only 200,000 bushels in store and about as much afloat. Stocks of oats have also increased, having 800,000 bushels here, or 200,000 bushels more than last week. In pork 5,000 tierces have been delivered here as part of May contracts, of which all but 1,000 tierces went to Fowler Brothers. This is said to about close by May delivery, most of them having been rung out beforehand.

Wonderful Power.

When a medicine performs such cures as Kidney Wort is constantly doing, it may truly be said to have wonderful power. A carpenter in Montgomery, Vt., had suffered for eight years from the worst of Kidney diseases, and had been wholly incapacitated for work. Kidney Wort made a new man of me, and I sincerely believe it will restore to health all that are similarly afflicted."

Slade's Cherry Tooth Paste.

An aromatic combination for the preservation of the Teeth and Gums. It is far superior to any preparation of its kind in the market. In large handsome tinal pots, price 50 cents. For sale by all Druggists.

Complicated Diseases.

A prominent gentleman in Cerro Gordo county, Iowa, writes us that he finds Kidney-Wort to be the best remedy he ever knew for a combination of diseases. It is the specific action which it has on the liver, kidneys and bowels, which gives it its curative power, and it is the thousands of cures which it is performing which gives it its great celebrity.

— The time has been when diseases of the Kidneys were considered serious affairs, but fortunately all fear of any fatal results from these troubles are now dispelled by the certainty with which DAY'S KIDNEY PAD always acts.

IRELAND

Irish Land Troubles.

DUBLIN, June 24.—The Catholic Bishop of Meath, speaking at a public meeting, heartily concurred in the principle of the Irish party on the Land bill, the introduction of which, he said, was owing to the Land League. He admitted the Land League people, but also to compensate them to the not forbidding for any loss they may sustain, and to do this with the help of Irishmen in America.

DISCUSSING THE RELATIONS OF ENGLAND AND IRELAND.

LONDON, June 25.—The Dublin Algernon Borthwick, the editor of the Morning Post, publishes a communication over his own name on the condition of Ireland. He admits that the present legislative union between Great Britain and Ireland exists only in name. He says it would be folly to make an attempt at compromise between two social systems resting on purposes and instincts totally distinct, and would only result in disappointment, mutual recrimination and failure. The Land League is an embodiment of radical ideas and proclivities. Justice to Ireland means in effect withdrawal by England from her intentions and her hoped-for results of union, viz., the creation of a homogeneous nation out of utterly discordant elements. It is now painfully apparent that the Home Rule members in the so-called Imperial Parliament are a standing protest against their being constituents from which any common legislation can proceed. What statesmen have influence enough and authority with their constituencies to have facts, and not wishes and assertions, made the guide of the nation's policy and the grounds of its legislation. The Irish race is actuated by radical propositions and notions totally distinct from those of the English. Nationality is with them a common system of law and industrial pursuits can possibly obtain between them except by constant force on one side, in the absence of timorous concession to the rule of the stronger. There is one other question to which we may make up our minds that we must sooner or later to face, and whether Ireland, as a part of the United Kingdom, is to be subjected and made obedient to laws and institutions, usages as ourselves, or is she by exceptional legislation in reference to her origin and proclivities due to her being outside of the ordinary jurisdiction and responsibilities of the Union while still component part of it. I will leave this last consideration of the Home Rule party, if I can and to be chewed of sweet and bitter juices by the Irish Secretary in one of his most frequent passages to and from the inter isle.

A MISSION FROM THE POPE.

A private starts for Rome next week on a mission from the Pope. The mission is to Ireland, and to report the true state of affairs. The Catholic Bishops in Ireland are specially instructed to exhort their flocks at all times from any action calculated to promote civil war in Ireland.

SKIRMISHERS AT WORK.

NEW YORK, June 24. The Tribune publishes an interview with O'Donovan Rossa, who says: "The Land Bill is a most ingenious measure, just as American slaves, just as Irishmen. I have a document on which I have put a larger than your head, which dashes me from living in the United States of Great Britain. Do you suppose that anything will deter me in title from doing all I can to secure for Ireland her rights? Nothing dreaded for any argument or entreaty.

"What, then," asked the reporter, "must be done?"

"Force must be used. We are not strong enough for open war, and so we must strike in secret. Dynamite is the weapon. It is a most effective instrument of the kind in the market. In large handsome tinal pots, price 50 cents. For sale by all Druggists.

Archbishop Croke.

HIS VOICE IN THE GOOD CAUSE STILL HEARD.

Magnificent Demonstration in Tipperary.

EXCELLENT ADVICE TO LEADERS AND PEOPLE.

No Surrender to Landlordism Keep up the Agitation.

TIPPERARY, Thursday, June 9th.

As our readers are already aware, his Grace the Archbishop of Cashel only recently returned from a visit of some one-third of his Archdiocese, his advent into each district being signalized by not alone a large and impressive but a thoroughly spontaneous demonstration. No Irish prince ever made such a triumphal march through his dominions as did the venerable Archbishop of Cashel, and such an outburst of love and popular feeling as the people of the premier county then manifested will not soon be forgotten by those who witnessed it. The demonstration in his honor here to-day eclipsed any of the assemblages—mighty though some of them were—that honored him in other portions of the county, and I think I can not over-estimate when I say that the streets of Tipperary town to-day rang with huzzy cheers from twenty thousand throats. Many of the houses were decorated with evergreens from roof to base, some had the fronts completely bowered in laurel and mottoed green banners, and the place was temporarily planted here and there in the street, so that the town had a vernal and refreshing appearance, and at every city posts one encountered large banners spanning the street, bearing words of welcome and patriotic inscriptions, such as "Cead mile failthe," "Welcome to our beloved Archbishop," "Bilton a Freedom," "Remember Davitt," "The Land for the People," "Orange and Green United." At intervals arches were erected or banners suspended across the road, bearing from the Limerick district to Tipperary. All the people within a radius of ten miles from this, who could afford the day, were present in Tipperary this morning, and at eleven o'clock the road from Tipperary to the Junction, and away towards Golohead, was black with people, the procession covering more than three miles. There were numerous banners, several bands, hundreds of horsemen, and scores of vehicles on the road at the Junction when the train from Thurles, bearing his Grace, arrived at eleven o'clock, and when the commanding figure of the distinguished prelate was first observed on the road lusty cheers went ringing through the air, and reverberating through the station. We had met at the junction on his arrival by the Very Rev. Mgr. Hurley, P. P., Tipperary, and a number of clergymen, as well as by the Land League executive, and the Town Commissioners, headed by their chairman, Mr. Wm. Hurley, and his Grace, amid defeaning cheers, again and again renewed was escorted to a carriage which was in waiting. The procession was then formed, and at one o'clock Tipperary was resounding with acclamations being drawn for about a mile of the road and through the streets not by horses, but by the stout and willing arms of his admirers. Arrived at the Abbey, the crowd swarmed in (at least as many as the yard would hold), and his Grace took up the position, together with the clergymen of priests (in fact, every parish in the Archdiocese was represented), the executive of the Land League, and the Town Commissioners, on a substantial platform erected for the purpose. His Grace, who was very enthusiastically received, said:

Mr. Chairman and fellow-countrymen—Amongst the many causes of reverential regard which my good people have been recently paying me, I am now rather unexpectedly called upon to reckon this truly magnificent demonstration together with your beautiful address just read, and which, making due allowance for certain patent and, perhaps, pardonable exaggerations regarding my humble self, I must thankfully accept (cheers). The history of the town of Tipperary cannot, it is true, compare in many notable and important respects with the city of Cashel of the Kings, which I visited the other day, and where I received a right royal reception; for besides that Cashel has, in many years gone by, given title to the first See of Munster, and the foremost one in Ireland at large; it also claims, and justly claims, to have been long great secular stronghold and a regal city of many stirring and memorable events, both in Church and State. Though Tipperary town cannot boast of such things as these, it can still claim to be not wanting even in the past in many features of interest, and in modern times Tipperary town is honorably distinguished, as it was first for its public spirit, its commercial stability, its patriotism, and, above all, its unflinching adherence, through weal and misfortune, to the cause of Irish nationality (great cheering). It is, indeed, a source of infinite satisfaction to me to be honored thus publicly and spontaneously by the good people of Tipperary (cheers), and I am honored in the Office-bearers of the Home Rule party which

Poetry.

TO THE SOGGARTH AROON AT KILMAINHAM.

Father Sheehy, you have fallen
Neath the foreign ruler's ban;
Father Sheehy, you have risen
In the hearts of every man
Who scorns the arrant hypocrite—
Of Europe is our say—
This freedom-preaching England,
With her arm upraised to slay
Every people seeking freedom
From her blood-cemented throne,
From the land of the Tricolour
To that island of our own!

Father Sheehy, they hate to see you
From your home prelacies apart;
But they ne'er can reach that Pantheon
Within dear Ireland's heart.
Where you now stand alshed and sinless
As a support brave and bold,
Bringing back to us great memories
Of the sainted priests of old,
Who stood like Celtic Sampsons
In the people's foremost fires,
Guarding Ireland's Ark of Freedom,
From the Satan Philistines!

Father Sheehy, they may chain you
In their dungeon vaults a while,
But they ne'er can chain the current—
That's now coursing through our isle—
That rises, seethes and surges,
Like some subterranean flood,
Intent upon upheaval
That the land be drenched with blood!
Ah! the hallowed Irish lambkin
Cannot see the rising tight,
That for you means endless trouble,
But for them portends black night.

Literary Miscellany.

A Story of Revenge.

The train was ready to leave the depot at the German city of Cologne. A young priest descended a second-class passenger car; he was alone as a traveller entered the same car; the priest received the stranger with the customary polite attentions. After a few seconds the train started; the stranger seemed to forget his surroundings, and the priest took advantage of this to observe him more closely. He was a man of strong constitution, yet whose features betrayed a profound grief; age had wrinkled his brow and whitened his hair. The priest was asking himself who his travelling companion could be when the stranger himself interrupt-d the silence.

"Reverend sir," said he, "I would like to ask a great service of you; you are a priest, and your heart cannot remain closed to an unhappy man."

"I will do all that is in my power in order to render you a service," replied the priest kindly.

Then the stranger continued: "Twenty years have elapsed since I finished my study of medicine in the city of Bonn, whither we are travelling. I took upon me to attend a friend who was a student, and was suffering from a horrible disease; but, in spite of all my care, the condition of the sick man grew worse day by day. The mother of my friend, in despair, summoned the assistance of another physician, a remarkable man in his profession, but a man that ought to be submitted to a treatment altogether different from mine, and in a moment of excitement, the young doctor, in presence of witnesses, exclaimed that the physician who had been treating the sick man was utterly unfit to continue the practice of medicine, and did not at all understand his business. These words, spread abroad by an impudent tongue, went their way and reached my ears. My pride was seriously offended by these utterances; I swore to get satisfaction with blood if they were not retracted. At that time I was taken up with the false principles which very many young men share about the duello and feelings of honor. I went to see the physician, and accused him of having obscured my honor and reputation; I maintained that, either he had to retract those words, or accept a challenge. The young man was nevertheless very kind; he showed me every mark of respect and attention, and assured me that it was not his intention to offend me by his words, but, because they were true, it was impossible for him to retract them. Being provoked, I left him and after a few hours I sent him a second. The young doctor, holding a false opinion that it was not possible to evade a meeting, appointed a place covered with thickets, in the proximity of the city, and it was agreed that we should meet there early next morning. In the evening, oppressed by a scornful anger, I kept my room, and all my thoughts devolved upon the impending fight. Suddenly there was a knock at the door, and a youthful lady, wearing a veil, entered the room and prostrated herself on her knees before me; she said: "I am the wife of the physician you have challenged; I beseech you to have pity upon me and my poor children.

The aspect of this weeping woman made a deep impression upon me; her anguish touched my heart, but soon my pride conquered.

"Madam," I replied, "either your husband shall retract his words, or he shall fight."

"I beseech you!" she groaned and then fainted. My two seconds who had just arrived helped to bring her to consciousness; one of them conveyed her home. The next day I went at the appointed time to the place designated. The physician had already arrived; two pistols were loaded. The seconds measured fifteen paces, and without fear I stood at the physician. At the command of fire only one shot was heard; a piercing and heartrending shriek came forth from the next thicket; the doctor's wife sprang forward and received her husband in her arms; the shot had penetrated his heart. The seconds surrounded him, and murmuring these words: "my poor wife! my poor children!" he breathed his last.

The woman lifted up her head, but no tear was rolling down her cheeks; she looked at me—I trembled.

'Sir,' said she, 'you have killed my husband; and very soon I shall follow him to the grave; three children will have made orphans; may our merciful Redeemer forgive you!'

She fainted, and on the same litter were carried the corpse of the husband and the insensible body of the wife. Like a madman I wandered about the whole day; I feared not pray, and the next day when I learned that the physician's wife had died—had followed her husband to the grave—I became so distracted that my friends feared that I would lose my mind. Instead of consoling me to perform my duty to the orphans and seek peace of mind and salvation of soul in practising penance, they advised me to forget the committed crime in debauchery and pleasures.

"He has offended you," they said, 'and you have killed him: that is quite natural; forget all this, and keep only in view your future welfare.

Following their advice, I embarked for America, after eight days, in order to practise my profession, without the least regret for leaving behind me in Germany, through my conduct, three helpless orphans. Twenty years I have attended closely to my business and I have become a wealthy man; but the remembrance of the innocent blood shed by me haunts me, and never leaves my mind. At last I looked for a priest to whom I confessed my crime. The venerable man of God told me to trace up the children of my victims, in order to repair, in some measure, the evil I had done; I only ask your Reverence to assist me in the search."

The young priest had listened with the greatest attention to his companion's story; his features were pale, and he was very much excited; he looked at the stranger, and would have answered him, as he asked: "Is it and true, Rev. Father! I do not deserve any pardon, and it will not be granted me." He had just finished these words, as the train stopped; they had reached Bonn.

"I know, said the priest, "those you are looking for; they are good Catholics; they will surely forgive you."

Meanwhile two boys came running to meet the servant of God; embracing him, they showed his unusual paleness. "Are you ill, dear brother?" asked one of them.

"I, no!" he answered, "I am only tired; great the penitentiary he gives me in the house to be our guest. The stranger smiled at the young priest with gratitude.

"You are too good, Reverend sir; indeed I do not know how to express my feelings of thankfulness towards you."

Leaning on the arm of the priest, he walked to the city; it seemed as if everything recalled to his mind the most painful remembrances. Turning into a certain street his eyes fixed upon a certain house, and he almost broke down. "He used to live there," he whispered softly in the ear of the priest. Soon they arrived at the priest's house; the servant of God conducted his companion to a room, and retired for a moment with his brothers.

Meanwhile a servant entered. "Please tell me," said the stranger, "with whom I have the honor to stop."

"You are in the house of the Rev.——" answered the servant, while he observed that the stranger grew pale.

"Is Mr. H——'s father living," asked the guest.

"No, he was killed in a duel, when the Reverend gentleman was very young."

After this interlocution, the priest with his brethers came in. The guest carried his face with his hands and threw himself on his knees.

"What are you doing, sir?" said the priest.

"I am the murderer of your father; oh! forgive me."

"Stand up, my friend; we have forgiven you already." At the first words you spoke to me I recognized you, and felt happy to receive you; forget the past; only thank God for your conversion."

The man arose, and after kissing the hands of Father H—— and his brothers, left the house and asked for admission to a convent in the city of Bonn. There he still lives and serves God in sorrow.

Building a House for the Evicted Tenant.

We quote the following from the columns of the Kerry Sentinel of the 17th inst.:

"At a recent meeting of the Dysagh Land League a deputation, consisting of Miss Walsh, President of the Ladies' Land League, Miss B. Reilihan, Vice-President; Miss K. P. Sheehy, and Miss J. K. Sheehy, waited on the members of the League, and announced that they received a sum of money from the central executive in Dublin, through Miss Anna Parnell, for the building of a house for Mrs. Dillane, lately evicted from her holding, the particulars of which have already appeared in the Sentinel. The deputation now asked the assistance of the Men's League to build the house. Mr. Fitzell, treasurer, at once offered a site, quite adjacent to the house from which Mrs. Dillane had been previously evicted. All the members of the League (who were present at the time) resolved to carry on the building, and to prove to the landlords that if they were turned out of one house they would very soon get into another. Thursday, 12th inst., was accordingly appointed for building the house, and about ten o'clock on that morning there appeared in the field chosen for the site fully 1,200 persons, and about 200 horses and carts. In that vast assemblage you had masons, carpenters, thatchers, etc., and many of the farmers brought with them all the necessary implements for the building of the house, such as stones, rushes, mortar, scraws, reed, etc. About two o'clock the walls were fully built, and, as the building was carried on under the auspices of the Land League, at this hour a magnificent spectacle presented itself in the appearance of 100 members of the Ladies' League, bearing green bangers, with suitable inscriptions, amidst the deafening cheers of the assembled hundreds. Soon after the Rev. B. Scanlan, C.C., accompanied by the Abbeyfeale brass band, came to witness the work of the Land League, and received a most enthusiastic reception. About five o'clock a neat and substantial house was built, roofed, and thatched. The Abbeyfeale band now entered the house and played the sentimental and soul-stirring song, "Home, Sweet Home." As all was completed the multitude fell into line and, headed by the band, marched four-deep to the village of Duah, where Father Scanlan congratulated them on the work of the day, and told them that it would be a proof to the rackrenting landlords of the district of what could be done when there have made orphans; may our merciful Redeemer forgive you!

She fainted, and on the same litter were carried the corpse of the husband and the insensible body of the wife. Like a madman I wandered about the whole day; I feared not pray, and the next day when I learned that the physician's wife had died—had followed her husband to the grave—became so distracted that my friends feared that I would lose my mind. Instead of consoling me to perform my duty to the orphans and seek peace of mind and salvation of soul in practising penance, they advised me to forget the committed crime in debauchery and pleasures.

"He has offended you," they said, 'and you have killed him: that is quite natural; forget all this, and keep only in view your future welfare.

Following their advice, I embarked for America, after eight days, in order to practise my profession, without the least regret for leaving behind me in Germany, through my conduct, three helpless orphans. Twenty years I have attended closely to my business and I have become a wealthy man; but the remembrance of the innocent blood shed by me haunts me, and never leaves my mind. At last I looked for a priest to whom I confessed my crime. The venerable man of God told me to trace up the children of my victims, in order to repair, in some measure, the evil I had done; I only ask your Reverence to assist me in the search."

The young priest had listened with the greatest attention to his companion's story; his features were pale, and he was very much excited; he looked at the stranger, and would have answered him, as he asked: "Is it and true, Rev. Father! I do not deserve any pardon, and it will not be granted me." He had just finished these words, as the train stopped; they had reached Bonn.

"I know, said the priest, "those you are looking for; they are good Catholics; they will surely forgive you."

Meanwhile two boys came running to meet the servant of God; embracing him, they showed his unusual paleness. "Are you ill, dear brother?" asked one of them.

"I, no!" he answered, "I am only tired; great the penitentiary he gives me in the house to be our guest. The stranger smiled at the young priest with gratitude.

"You are too good, Reverend sir; indeed I do not know how to express my feelings of thankfulness towards you."

Leaning on the arm of the priest, he walked to the city; it seemed as if everything recalled to his mind the most painful remembrances. Turning into a certain street his eyes fixed upon a certain house, and he almost broke down. "He used to live there," he whispered softly in the ear of the priest. Soon they arrived at the priest's house; the servant of God conducted his companion to a room, and retired for a moment with his brothers.

Meanwhile a servant entered. "Please tell me," said the stranger, "with whom I have the honor to stop."

"You are in the house of the Rev.——" answered the servant, while he observed that the stranger grew pale.

"Is Mr. H——'s father living," asked the guest.

"No, he was killed in a duel, when the Reverend gentleman was very young."

After this interlocution, the priest with his brethers came in. The guest carried his face with his hands and threw himself on his knees.

"What are you doing, sir?" said the priest.

"I am the murderer of your father; oh! forgive me."

"Stand up, my friend; we have forgiven you already." At the first words you spoke to me I recognized you, and felt happy to receive you; forget the past; only thank God for your conversion."

The man arose, and after kissing the hands of Father H—— and his brothers, left the house and asked for admission to a convent in the city of Bonn. There he still lives and serves God in sorrow.

ERUPTION OF MOUNT VESUVIUS.—The earthquake shocks on Mount Vesuvius have been followed by a strong eruption. Broad and active streams of lava are running quickly down the north-eastside of the mountain.

"LOVE ALL MEN."

A Venerable Priest's Advice.

The Venerable Father Malone, pastor of SSs. Peter and Paul's Church, Williamsburg, N. Y., who recently sailed for Europe, delivered a farewell address in which he gave his congregation some very practical advice in regard to their duty to their fellow-men outside the pale of the church. The first sermon I preached, as I remember, said Father Malone, was on charity, its principles and teachings; and I have tried to make this virtue the star guiding me in my course of life, as I was called to minister, not only to the physical wants of dependent members in society, but still more to be charitable in word and thought towards those who were not seen to worship at the same altar with me. Take a real pleasure in being able to say that my dissenting brethren had ever my warmest sympathies, and the full measure of charity, which the Blessed One Himself has so often inculcated in word and deed, and that, too, I hope, to the extent that it is possible for a human being to show his neighbor in this our earthly state. It is here we dread we fall in not doing our best to love all in Christ. While I would in no way change one iota of Catholic doctrine, not for all the men on earth, I yet believe there is a way to present our faith to those who are without the church, which, not being in the least derogatory to the principles of the Catholic faith, would nevertheless be the means of inducing others to worship in the true Church. There are many souls who are estranged from us through ignorance or prejudice, they can be assisted by our intelligence, our fidelity to our civil duty, our patience in trials, and our honesty and truthfulness, which we should prove in all

THE RELATIONS WE HOLD WITH OUR FELLOW-CITIZENS.

I feel satisfied with my public record on this head; I have gone among my New England citizens on their annual celebration of the landing of the Pilgrim Father's at Plymouth Rock, and have felt honored in such society; why should not every one feel so who enjoys the civil liberties secured to this country, mainly through the devotion of freedom and equality of the descendents of the early English-speaking founders of the New England colony! They laid the foundation of these principles in the Constitution of the country, even though they themselves are not without grave faults. These principles enable you and me, children of the Catholic Church, to rejoice in the possession of religious freedom, such as has never been enjoyed, to the same extent, by any other people in this or any age. The persecuted people of Israel, the mere mention of God we adore, the God of Isaac, the God of Jacob, they, too, have claimed at my hands, as far as I, an humble citizen of the republic, could be instrumental in their relief—to celebrate with them the Paschal Supper, reminds them of their deliverance from wrong. They have suffered persecution under every government save our own dear republic.

WHY SHOULD WE NOT REJOICE THAT THEY ARE FREEMEN HERE?

We are not required to believe as they do, but we may give them the warm hand of friendship. It is our duty as Christians and fellow-citizens, that we should all work together in this nation, to aid her in the accomplishment of the ends of the great future Providence has placed before her. My Knickerbocker fellow-citizens, too, would have me rejoice with them, as they more than once intimated to me, to join with them in honoring St. Nicholas. I need say nothing of my course during the last civil war; as Catholics and citizens we were to fulfil both the Constitution and laws of the land; it was clearly our duty to stand shoulder to shoulder with those brave and patriotic heroes who sustained the government of the nation when some of her own citizens dared to insult the flag. No man to-day would assume the responsibility of desiring any other result than the one which followed the civil conflict, and no man would now have the hardihood to advocate chains, and not liberty, for creatures human being was formed for protection, for family and home, under the wide spreading folds of the Stars and Stripes, that glorious ensign of a nation of freemen. Why do I touch on these events? I will soon be away from where I have taken, it is true, a very humble part in defending its honor, but, looking back on all I have done, I wish to say I would take the same course did the same society again exist. What I chiefly pride myself on is that, though devoted to my adopted country as the proudest in the land, I never experienced the least interference from the ecclesiastical authorities to whom, as a priest, I owed implicit obedience. Were I not in harmony with the laws of my religion I would have been censured, and would then have withdrawn from active citizenship and gone into that retirement which is more congenial to my natural and acquired habits of life.

THE LAND I LOVE MOST DEARLY,

Is John McCullough an Irishman?

A "native American," writing to a New York paper says:—"With pride I read of Mr. John McCullough's success in London. He is styled by the cable and the press at large the great American actor. Would it not be more appropriate to call him what he is—the great Irish-American actor!

John McCullough was born in the city of Belfast, Ireland, and came to this city at the age of sixteen, and to his own Celtic genius and indomitable pluck is due the position he holds to-day. If the case was reversed, Mr. McCullough would be arrested in one of our criminal courts, no doubt we should hear from what county in Ireland he came from, and the ship that brought him over. America is too rich in literary and other attainments to follow the course of England and Scotland, who have tried for centuries to pass off on an unsuspecting world the great men of Ireland as their own. Honor to whom honor is due.—Pilot.

Strange Scene at a Chapel in Mayo.

We visited the chapel known as Barnacarroll on last Sunday. It has now become somewhat famous from the proceedings which took place there, and from the notice taken of them in the Dublin dailies, and above all from the relation which the event presents in connection with the great question of the hour—the land agitation in Ireland. As we passed we observed seven of the constabulary marching from Claremorris at about 10 o'clock to the country church of Claremorris parish. The neat white church is quite typical of what a church ought to be, situated on the mountain top. It is nicely built on the hillside.—There it stands and can be seen from Claremorris or Knock. It is a half-way religious home from Knock, coming to Claremorris. Its white walls are an emblem too of the purity of the faith which is taught. Knock, because of the "miraculous" accounts reporting it, is now wide-world famous. Claremorris is not unknown on account of its land meetings—one and the first of its kind in July, 1880, when Canon Bourke and Michael Davitt stood on the same platform—representing there the union of priests and people, and proclaiming, for the first time, from a public platform, the programme for a peasant proprietary.

Arriving at Barnacarroll, I observed a wooden house that had been, I heard, lately erected by members of the Land League as a shelter and a home for one of those families—the Kearns—who had been ejected from their own home. The congregation were gathered from the several roads, and by 11 o'clock, all appeared to have come who were to hear Mass that day.

At 11 Canon Bourke left the confessional and came through the sanctuary to the sacristy to prepare to say Mass, one of the Land Leaguers told him the people were excited, and would not suffer Mr. Bourke to be present in the church with a gun in his pew. "Is it so?" said Father Bourke; then immediately he went to Mr. Bourke and spoke to him. The latter directly followed the Canon into the sacristy.

Canon Bourke then said, "You must not be in the church with a gun. Hear Mass, if necessary, away from the people, or leave the gun some place apart."

Mr. Bourke replied that he deemed it necessary for his safety that he should have the gun.

All this was said in the sacristy. Meantime several voices were raised in the body of the church "Out! out!" With that, as it is said, the people began to move forward by the front door, and very soon the most of the congregation had proceeded to the chapel-yard. We learned that many strangers were amongst those present on the occasion. Canon Bourke proceeded by the sacristy door up to the people, and addressed them as follows, as nearly as I could be learned from bystanders:—"Boys, I—neither was his gun. They replied that he was in his pew when Mass was over and have a conversation with him. The Reverend gentleman received the evening address in a calm and Christian spirit. After some repose next day, Mr. Converse asked Father McLaughlin, as the man from Ethiopia ridiculed the Ethiopian, to baptise him there anyway, which was Easter Monday, 1842. He then became a Catholic and a priest, maintaining until death and illumination, the Catholic faith, the sturdy good sense which made him conscientiously and manfully, but was educated, and which made his acceptance of the gift of faith so easy and grateful. He held, among important trusts in his Order.—R.I.P.

THE CATHOLIC COLONIZATION SOCIETY.—A dividend of ten per cent. on capital stock payable in sixty days had been declared. The Secretary, in reporting to the Directors the work of the year, called attention to the aims and purposes of the association, which were to aid and encourage Irish emigrants to come to the United States and locate on the fertile lands of the West. Its purposes was avowed in its charter. There was more than money at stake in this association, the greater results were looked for and expected for it. Somebody had said that to found colonies was the greatest glory and triumph than to command armies or achieve victories. This association, whose success had been doubtful, was the offspring of a great undertaking, and it is to be hoped that he will meet with a generous response, not only from the Irish flock and neighbors as he is sure to do, but from Catholics in England, many of whose ancestors were fellow-sufferers with this illustrious victim of the persecution under Charles II.

A Lunatic's Attempt to Assassinate a Priest.

CARBONDALE, Pa., June 13.—Patrick Reilly of Smoketown, a suburb of the town of Olyphant, on the line of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company's railroad shops, attempted to assassinate Father Hoban on Sunday morning by an attempt to assassinate the Rev. Father O'Rourke during the celebration of Mass. Reilly escaped from the Danville Insane Asylum a few months ago, and has been frantic at times since. He came to the church armed with two pistols, through the principal streets to the church, carrying a loaded repeating rifle. On reaching the church he passed up the central aisle to the altar, and aimed his gun at the priest. Several men caught him before he could fire.

—Coming events cast their shadows before. It was noticed that the Prince of Wales took much pleasure when at Vienna in talking to the pretty Princess Clementine, the youngest daughter of the King of the Belgians. "You also, Princess," said he to her, "will marry some day." The little Princess blushed, as maidens do when marriage is spoken of, and it appeared as if themselves. The Prince smiled, and turning towards the King, added, "Who knows, perhaps she may become my daughter-in-law?" The King then smiled in his turn—and nothing.

Religious Record.

United States.

THE SEE OF LA CROSSE.—The Rev. Caspar Killian Flasch has been elected Bishop of La Crosse, Wisconsin.

BROTHERS OF THE CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS.—The Brotherhood of Christian Schools at present numbers 3,000 serving and 12,000 teaching Brothers, having under their charge hundreds of thousands of pupils in Europe, Asia, Africa and America. Thereway 1,000 members of the Order in the United States and the Canadas, giving instruction in the principal cities to some 70,000 pupils in 170 parish schools, 15 academies and 10 colleges.

A REMARKABLE CONVERSION.—When, asks the Catholic Review, will the history of the conversions of Americans to the Catholic Church be written? Completely, most certainly never, unless in the Book of Life. Yet there are chapters that might be unveiled to-day to the great profit and edification of souls. One of these comes from St. Louis in the obituary of a Jesuit priest. Father Cornevaux, a convert by birth and of Puritan ancestry. Emigrating westward, like so many of the enterprising men of his section, he engaged in copper mining on Lake Superior and practised law in Cleveland. An honest, earnest man, he devoted himself to the study of the religions of the period and found them all lead Sea Apples. "Religion," says his biographer in the Waters Watchman, "occupied a considerable share in his thoughts, wherever he was and whatever employments he was engaged. After abandoning the denomination of religion in which he had been reared, he drifted from one Church to another during several years, studying successfully all the confessions of faith on which he could lay his hands, his changing opinions caused him to join quite a number of sects, but not remaining long in membership with any one. At there were certain fundamental questions to which he could find no satisfactory answer in any of the Churches to which he had attached himself, he became unsettled in mind and despondent; he began to think seriously of damning the subject of religion from his thoughts altogether. He was in this state of mind when on Easter Sunday, 1842, he was casually passing the door of the Catholic Church in Cleveland during divine service. He never had, up to that time, thought it worthy his attention to examine the claims of the Church of Christ on rational belief, because its fatuity, as it is said, the people go to more forward by the front door, and very soon the most of the congregation had proceeded to the chapel-yard. We learned that many strangers were amongst those present on the occasion. Canon Bourke proceeded by the sacristy door up to the people, and addressed them as follows, as nearly as I could be learned from bystanders:—"Boys, I—neither was his gun. Centenary of Archbishop Plunkett Martyr.

Monday, the 11th of July next, will be the bi-centenary of the martyrdom of the glorious Primate of Ireland, Archbishop Plunkett, and on the day previous, the Sunday, the foundation stone of the new church of St. Peter at Drogheda will be laid with due solemnity. The Bishop of Galway, whose knowledge of the history of the Irish martyr is perhaps unrivalled, is to preach, and a great gathering of Catholics is expected on the occasion; as the church, though dedicated to St. Peter, is also intended as a memorial to the illustrious prelate so fondly done to death. The evidence on which he was canonized was given by his countrymen, but by "profligates," as Hume tells us, "sent over to Ireland to swear out a plot against the Catholics." This parish priest of St. Peter's, Father R. Murphy, is making an appeal to Catholics to help him in paying the expenses of this great undertaking, and it is to be hoped that he will meet with a generous response, not only from the Irish flock and neighbors as he is sure to do, but from Catholics in England, many of whose ancestors were fellow-sufferers with this illustrious victim of the persecution under Charles II.

THE COERCION ACT.

Particulars of the Arrest and Imprisonment of Mr. A. J. Kettle.

ARBITRARY CONDUCT OF THE POLICE.

Mr. Kettle Tells the People Pay No Rent.

The Freeman of Tuesday says: Another prominent member of the Land League movement was arrested under the Coercion Act. Shortly after five o'clock Mr. Andrew J. Kettle, of Artane, was taken into custody at the Kink's-bridge Terminus. The warrant by virtue of which the arrest was made charges him with "being reasonably suspected of inciting persons unlawfully to assemble together and commit riot, for the purpose of obstructing and preventing the execution of the process of the law," and also of "inciting to an act of violence." The warrant mentioned the county Roscommon as the place where the offence stated in which the alleged crime had been committed. In the morning Mr. Kettle had transacted business for two hours at the offices of the Central League, Upper Sackville street, and at one o'clock left Dublin with Mr. Clancy (also a member of the Central League), to visit Mr. Thomas Brennan in Naas prison. Mr. Kettle had a lengthened interview with Mr. Brennan, and, when leaving, scarcely expected that before nightfall he would rejoin him within the walls of the jail. On his return journey to Dublin he left Sallins at 4:30, and reached King's-bridge at 5:30. As he and Mr. Clancy were about to get on a car, Inspector Prandy and Acting-Inspector McCormack, of the G division, approached, and informed him that they had a warrant for his arrest, and that he should then consider himself in custody. Mr. Kettle, Mr. Clancy, and the detective officers got into a cab and drove to the Detective Office at Exchange-court. Here the prisoner was shown into the mess-room, and Mr. Clancy procured him some luncheon. Mr. Kettle requested that he might be allowed to go home, or at least to call at the house of a relative living in the city, so that he might give directions about the management of his affairs and obtain some books and an overcoat. Acting-Inspector McCormack, in the absence of Mr. Superintendent Mallon, said he should first obtain advice on the matter, and proceeded to the office of the Chief Secretary, Upper Castle Yard. In a few moments he returned, and stated that he had received instructions that Mr. Kettle was not to be allowed to leave the Detective Office until he went to the Naas prison. Mr. Kettle, much disappointed at this message, claimed that an exception should be made in his case, when all the other prisoners had been allowed to go home, and had already obtained it. Sherry (one of the Kilmainham "boys") was at the office, and he, with Mr. Kettle, E. Clancy, and detective officers Smith, McCormack, and Prandy, immediately left in a cab for King's-bridge terminus. There Mr. Kettle was met by Mr. W. F. Molony, Mountjoy-square, and Mr. Quin, of the Land League, with whom he conversed in the interval before the train left. He gave some instructions which he wished carried out, and, as he stepped into the train, said to Mr. Quin, in an audible tone, "I go in a reformer to come out a revolutionist." He desired to express his thanks to Mr. Mallon and the other detective officers for the marked courtesy they had shown him from the time of his arrest. Mr. Clancy was permitted by Mr. Mallon to travel in the same coupe as Mr. Kettle as far as Sallins.

The train reached Sallins about twenty minutes before nine o'clock. On the railway platform a dozen police constables under the direction of a sergeant had been awaiting the arrival of the train, and when Mr. Kettle and his defective escort stepped out on the platform an effort was made to obtain cars to convey the whole party to Naas. The ordinary carmen declined the "fares," saying they had been already engaged, and, as a last resource, the royal mail was secured. This, it is said, was by his countrymen, but by "profligates," as Hume tells us, "sent over to Ireland to swear out a plot against the Catholics." This parish priest of St. Peter's, Father R. Murphy, is making an appeal to Catholics to help him in paying the expenses of this great undertaking, and it is to be hoped that he will meet with a generous response, not only from the Irish flock and neighbors as he is sure to do, but from Catholics in England, many of whose ancestors were fellow-sufferers with this illustrious victim of the persecution under Charles II.

THE SIEGE OF QUINLAN CASTLE.

THE COLDSTREAM GUARDS ON THE WAR-PATH.

Finding only Old Women to Fight Against.

The Anthrotites Fight Among Themselves.

Limerick Junction, Sunday June 5.

I thought that when her Majesty's Guards sallied out to the siege of Tim Quinlan's phantom castle they had performed the most ridiculous feat of arms that ever occurred to Cervantes in his wildest dream. But upon the whole their exploits yesterday were still more impotent. On Friday they had left their barracks in Chelsea, convincing the great British public that there was no such place as Quinlan's Castle, that the dilapidated three walls, so called, was a roofless ruin, that there was nobody in it, and that the whole story of the affair had its origin in the beguiling to end an impudent and unblushing lie. Upon Saturday they had not the glory of encountering even men in buckrans. The Guards of Waterloo were solemnly engaged in assisting a deaf old mother-in-law to eject her son-in-law, a day laborer, from a little hut on the roadside, and subsequently they had the happiness of standing to arms while the remnants of tea and tallow candles were being thrown in the village of Nicker, who was short in his rent, were being scattered on the road. This was, in literal fact, the whole day's work of the illustrated expedition which the Tory newspapers had heralded with blast and thunder. And having done this doughty deed the Guards executed a dignified retreat to Dublin, leaving the aborigines much impressed by their bearskins and their method of falling into line. The Guards, however, in leaving a little irreverently of an affair which nevertheless had its sinister and dangerous side. But really the army of the tirnan must be employed somewhere, and, the more comically employed. For the unfortunate soldiers themselves, and still more for the unfortunate policemen who had to do the work while the Guards did the majesty, the joke was doubtless a bad one. At eight o'clock in the morning they were routed from their encampment at New Pallas and took the road for Kilteely. The column was, as before, under the military charge of Col. Hall, and consisted of the Coldstream Guards and the Scots Fusilier Guards, with an Ambulance wagon displaying the red cross of the Geneva Convention. Dense bodies of policemen were massed in front of and behind the military, the advanced guard and the rear-guard being composed of men armed only with their batons, and commanded by constables familiar with the faces of the people in the district. When the column had proceeded about a mile it was suddenly discovered that they had come without a resident magistrate, and were playing "Hamlet" without a Prince. A halt was called for nearly an hour, until Captain Hatchell, R. M., who had commanded with much temper and vigor on Friday, was able to overtake them. The sheriff fell out with Captain Hatchell, Captain Hatchell fell out with Mr. Goddard, and finally the sheriff and Mr. Goddard fell out with one another to the edification of all bystanders. In fact, the only thing upon which everybody agreed with everybody else at the end of the day was, that the sub-sheriff was, in the language of the anthrites, the most utterly utter public official whom a playful fate has ever set up as a community of men. The sub-sheriff is a young person of the name of Naish, who has got very little beyond his teens either in age or wisdom. This young man had the effrontery to tax Captain Hatchell with neglecting his duty. Captain Hatchell did not, it appears, think it necessary to order the Guards to fire on every old woman and country girl who did not appreciate Mr. Naish's style of beauty. Mr. Naish flourished the Lord Lieutenant's proclamation in his face, and threatened in the most offensive way that he would report him to Mr. Forster for the way he was neglecting to carry it out. Captain Hatchell retorted by pointing out that Mr. Naish's conduct would be brought under the notice of the High Sheriff. Any exertion of brute force at the moment would have been more wantonness. Nobody dreamed they would have spent their day ejecting a poor laborer and a village hunter. When they were signalled at all in the district the people were sufficiently employed in driving away the cattle of those (and they are unhappily many) who are liable any day to a distress for rent. The chapel bell at Kilteely was tolled for a short time, in the morning, not as a tocsin, and the shops in the village were shuttered and closed with the same motive. So little else was there to the intentions of the invading army that no clergyman in the district had got notice of the visit, and none of them appeared during the day. The people simply held aloof with perfect self-possession. Captain Hatchell, having disposed of Mr. Naish, found himself no less annoying and embarrassed by the proceedings of Mr. Goddard. When Mr. Goddard wandered about the main street of the column to the other, explaining his glories to the officers of the Guards, Captain Hatchell requested him to resume the place assigned to him in the ranks of the police escort. Mr. Goddard flatly declined, "I am responsible for your protection," said Captain Hatchell, "and I cannot answer for your safety if you will not carry out my arrangements." Mr. Goddard intimated that he was able to take care of himself, and did not want his protection. "Then am I to understand that you decline my protection and refuse my directions?" That was precisely what Mr. Goddard meant him to understand, and he said so; and set Captain Hatchell's authority at defiance, as he had set Colonel's Smith's in Dublin, and as he presently set the sheriff's, too. He is the Colossus under whose legs Mr. Forster carries on his little Government by coercion, and he perfectly realizes that not only is Mr. Forster Captain Hatchell's master, but that he himself is Mr. Forster's master. The first halt of the army was made to enable Johanna Mulcahy to turn her son-in-law out of a wayside cabin half a mile from Kilteely. The cabin is on the property of Mr. E. J. Synan, M. P., but the eviction had no more to do with Mr. Synan nor with the land question than the color of the mother-in-law's eyes or the sharpness of her tongue. It was a family falling out of the most temporary description. The mother-in-law and son-in-law had quarrelled over there, not in harmony, and the mother-in-law, having procured a wayside daughter unmarried, lethought herself of turning the married couple out of the cabin in order that she might be able to tempt some unmarried swain into a wooing by the prospects of a dowry. The cry of "Up, Guards, and at Johanna Mulcahy's son-in-law," therefore resounded on the summer breeze. To be strictly accur

THE MONITOR.

TWENTY-FOURTH YEAR OF PUBLICATION.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

THURSDAY..... JUNE 30.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

During the next two weeks Ms. S. J. McCormick will visit the following and other places in Sierra, Nevada and Yuba counties, in the interest of the Monitor, viz:—Truckee, Sierra City, Downieville, Marysville, Laporte, St. Louis, Howland Flat, Whiskey Diggings, Forest City, Camptonville, Cherokee, Moore's Flat, French Corral, San Juan, Bloomington, Smartsville and Timbuctoo. Ms. McCormick hopes that all persons who know themselves indebted to the Monitor will be prepared to settle their accounts when he calls, and he asks the aid of the Rev. clergy and friends of the paper, in every place he may visit to help him in propagating the press that defends the Faith and the Church it represents.

Some Advice to Land Leaguers from Archbishop Croke.

On our first page will be found an admirable speech, delivered in Tipperary, on the 9th inst., by Archbishop Croke, in which he gave some excellent advice to both leaders and followers in the present great Land League agitation. In such a crisis of affairs, Irishmen will listen with great respect and attention to the voice of one whose patriotism and political foresight are so universally recognised. To a naturally excitable, impulsive race, goaded to desperation by the outrageously tyrannical course of the British Government, a word of wisdom and of caution, coming from the lips of a beloved and devoted Prelate, will check the impulses of the populace to deeds of rashness, and restrain the leaders from a fruitless war of reprisals. Both Archbishop Croke and Bishop Nulty have pointed out to the people the folly of resisting the armed forces of the Government. John Dillon has done the same from his prison cell. Sticks and stones are no match for bayonet and rifle. If the authorities should be provoked into actual hostility, the people would be shot down like dogs. Passive resistance and unity of action should be the people's motto and rule of action, if they desire success.

The Coercion Act has proved a lamentable Government failure, whilst it has done good service to the cause of the people. Its enforcement has cemented and strengthened the Land League all over the country. In districts where, previous to the passage or enforcement of this Act, the Land League did not exist, the arrest of some person or persons, well known to the community, has aroused the indignation of the people and made them rampant Leaguers. The "suspects," who have been thrown into jail by Captain Kettle, been transformed from reformers into revolutionists.

Archbishop Croke tells the Parliamentary leaders the fate of the country for many years to come is in their hands. "I earnestly trust and pray," he says, "that they may prove equal to the occasion, and I believe they will, and in order to do this their policy for the next two or three months must be one of judicious flexibility as well as firmness. They must be firm in their determination not to accept the bill now before the House of Commons, unless it shall come out of committee in such a shape as to render it a clear substantial boon to the tenant-farmers of Ireland. But, at the same time, they must be most careful not to vote against or reject the measure in the not improbable event that any, some, or several of the minor amendments proposed by the popular party have not been incorporated with it.

In plain words, the Archbishop advises them not to risk their support of the Land Bill upon the idea of carrying all or none of the amendments they have proposed, but to be satisfied with carrying all substantial ones. Minor amendments can be left for a future occasion. The Archbishop's advice to the people is still more significant, weighty and impressive. They know his pluck and determination, and that his words have not the honeyed smack of pliable or subservient Whiggery. "Bill or no bill," says the Archbishop, "the people must take care not to bring themselves into violent collision—the unarmed and defenceless people of this country must take care not to bring themselves into collision with the armed forces of this great Empire. I recommend you to be conspicuous by your absence for the future wherever the police or military appear in large numbers, whether it may be to effect the eviction of a tenant or for the sale of the tenant's interest in his farm. Meetings of the kind, I tell you—and I have reason to know—large meetings of this kind will do you no good. Shouting and stone throwing may become for the future a very dangerous practice, and I recommend and solemnly adjure the people to beware of it."

—A new plot against the life of the Czar has been reported. The police received information of a meeting of Nihilists; and in consequence a lieutenant-colonel was hidden in the apartment adjoining that of the meeting. He is said to have been an uninvited guest whilst twenty-one Nihilists discussed a plot for shooting the Emperor. For six hours he listened to this treasonable conversation; and then, giving the signal by firing a pistol, he collected his assistants and arrested the would-be regicides. These men are described as very young, most of them being still at the Gymnasia. Simultaneously with the discovery of this plot, the Czar received a commonation from the Executive Committee to the effect, that his doom had been pronounced. The Winter Palace is being prepared for the reception of a battalion of twelve hundred men; and the squares in front of the building will be surrounded by a railing, and closed to the public.

Press Dispatches Relating to Irish Affairs.

Much of the matter contained in the dispatches relating to the present agitation in Ireland and its future prospects, furnished by the Associated Press to our daily newspapers, is simply individual opinions given by newspaper correspondents of certain prominent New York journals. Their views of the situation are biased by the character and tone of the newspaper for which they write. They are sent to do a certain work mapped out for them, and are told to write in accordance with certain ideas explained to them, and they must act accordingly, or be deprived of their bread and butter.

The newspapers, which furnish most of this kind of pabulum, are the New York World, Times and Herald. The first is a great Democratic organ, (God save the mark), owned and controlled by the King of Bosses and Grand Master of the Monopoly Ring, Jay Gould. The Herald is owned by that pompous, flunkey Bennett, who toadies to the English aristocracy and spes their manners and style of living. Its treatment of Parnell, upon the occasion of his visit to this country, in the cause of charity, shows how much its opinions on the Land Question are worth to Irishmen.

The Times is the stalwart organ of the Republican party, the staunch supporter of monopoly, and the champion of American aristocracy. It has nothing in common whatsoever with the poor or working classes. These are the three main sources from whence come all the details furnished daily to us about current events in Ireland. If the sources are poisoned, can we expect healthy matter to flow from them? If the root is rotten or bad, so will the tree and its branches and its fruit likewise be. If we trace statement concerning the Land League and its operations can we expect from Jay Gould or James Gordon Bennett?

We are sick and disgusted with the namby-pamby, frothy, contemptible, mean, nonsensical stuff dished up for our daily perusal as "news" by these veracious penny-a-liners of the New York press. "Throw such physic to the dogs, we'll none of it." We will not encumber our columns with such lying trash. The Land League, and Parnell, and Archbishop Croke, and other distinguished leaders of the Irish people, ought long ago have gone to the dogs, if these hireling correspondents were to be believed.

They pretend to know more about the doings of the Vatican than the Pope himself, of the course intended to be pursued by the English Government than either Gladstone or Forster, and of the work of the Land League than Parnell or Egan. We would advise our readers to deduct from the Associated Press dispatches, ninety-five per cent discount for prejudice and five per cent. for wear and tear. Then you have them at their true value.

Christian Brothers' versus Public Schools.

An interesting trial of educational strength between the pupils attending the Christian Brothers' and the Public Schools of Toronto, Canada, lately took place in that city. The Archbishop of Toronto having asserted that the Catholic schools were the equal, if not the superior of the Public schools in common school education, a gentleman, prominently identified with the local press, made it his business to bring the matter to a test. Accordingly he interviewed the representatives of both systems, in order to have them select an equal number of boys, to whom he would submit a series of questions on different subjects. We append the results made out from a Toronto paper, the Telegram's report, as follows:

	Public	Brothers'
Arithmetic (correct answers)	12	12
Spelling (words written correctly)	48	45
Grammar (correct answers)	41	40
Geography " "	27	164
History " "	7	16

These figures give no less than 67 marks in favor of the Christian Brothers' school boys over those of the Public Schools. Our readers will be gratified at the result. The unquestionable facts and figures brought out in this contest should once for all silence those who, without the shadow of a reason, say the Christian Brothers' schools are inferior to the Public schools. It has been demonstrated on the authority of the Telegram that four Catholic boys of 13, 14, 14, and 15 years of age respectively, have gained a victory over four public school boys, two of them 15 years of age, and two, in the words of the Telegram, "just turned 16."

This is indeed a very flattering showing for the Christian Brothers, and proves conclusively that the instruction of youth in morality and religion can go hand in hand with secular education without the slightest detriment to the latter. On the contrary, pupils who are taught to reverence holy things, and who are properly instructed in their duties to God and to their neighbor will naturally acquire such good habits as to devote themselves earnestly to their duties in all other respects. This test of the relative merits of public and Catholic schools by the results only corroborates the report of the English Government Education Commission with regard to the Christian Brothers' schools in Ireland, published a short time ago in the Monitor, and which was equally flattering to the excellent training of pupils by the Christian Brothers.

—Much important matter is crowded out this week. The pressure upon our columns from correspondence, etc., is very great, which clearly proves the great interest now taken in the Monitor by its numerous readers. Communications should be sent in early in the week as we go to press promptly on Thursday morning.

How Our State Educates Crown's Pupils.

California takes a front place among the tax-ridden States of the Union, or, to speak more in accordance with progressive ideas of the Nation. Great in extent, glorious in climate, unsurpassed in industrial wealth and resources, she is immense in taxes. California and her metropolis, San Francisco, though comparatively free from debt, can spend more money annually, and with less profitable result, than almost any other State and city in the Union.

Last week we showed the wonderful capabilities of the latter in this regard. We now turn to the former. For a population under one million we have two State Prisons, two Lunatic Asylums, a Deaf and Dumb Asylum, a Blind Asylum, a University and two Normal Schools. On the line of State education—that of our University and Normal Schools—is a confessed failure; another line of State education—that of our Prison—an acknowledged success. The Board of Regents have been forced to admit the State University was badly managed, and they are now trying what a change of officers and professors can do to remedy the evil. It is none too soon. While a hospital for the dying salaries approaching one hundred thousand a year, an attendance of less than two hundred pupils, and the graduation of one or two a year, is, indeed, a very poor showing. Five hundred dollars, per head, per annum, as the cost of teaching young gentlemen and ladies the higher branches of studies is rather "steep." Of course they have the advantage of acquiring some knowledge in a line of aesthetic culture not laid down in the class books of the University, and of their proficiency in which they gave public proof a short time since. To the credit of the Institution, it must be said, many were expelled in consequence. It was the publication, by the Sophomore class, of certain highly immoral and obscene matter which was widely distributed. As the University is now in the throes of reform, we patiently await results and turn to the unquestionably successful State educational institution, commonly known as the State Prison. Here young men and women receive a thorough course of instruction in all branches relating to petty and grand larceny, burglary, highway robbery, malfeasance in office and out of office, bigamy, polygamy, divorce, rape, adultery, and every other department of vice laid down in the penal code. The institution being supported by the State, education is free. Public attention has lately been drawn to the educational advantages afforded by this model institution (!)—nigh the medium of the opinions of the press, elicited by the remarks made by Judge Freelon, of the Superior Court, in sentencing a young man to life imprisonment in San Quentin. The learned Judge said "I do not think it would be justice to the community to sentence him to ten or fifteen years, permitting him to come out in the prime of manhood and strength, educated to a still greater degree in vice and crime, made acquainted with all the latest devices of crime by the vice convicts confidantly entering.

Therefore, out of consideration for the prisoner, as well as for the protection of the community, the Judge sentenced this young man, a native of Germany, early manhood, to life imprisonment, rather than to a short term. What a and commentary upon our State Prison management. All the leading organs of public opinion have re-echoed and endorsed the sentiments of the Judge and his opinions concerning the gross mismanagement of our State penal establishment. The San Francisco Examiner calls it "a hotbed of crime, a training school for criminality, and a very pandemonium of evil." "It was an infamous den of iniquity, a disgrace to the civilization of the age in which we live, and a blot upon the fair fame of California." This is certainly strong language, but not much stronger than that used by the Chronicle, Bulletin, Record-Union, San Jose Mercury, and other papers.

There should be a thorough overhauling of the institution. No sham, red-tape investigation. Incompetent officials should be discharged, and a Chief Warden selected, not on account of his political influences or services, but for his moral, mental, and physical qualifications for the office. Let us have a man skilled in the proper management of such institutions. The framers of our present Constitution made an effort to prevent the Prison from being the domain of politics, but they have lamentably failed. The Directors have been selected, not on account of their fitness for the position, but on account of their willingness to vote for the present Warden.

As in nearly every other department of our State and Municipal Government, corporate greed and corporate influence have made themselves felt, in fosting upon the public incompetent and corrupt officials, so have they also in our State Prison. If the outcry justly raised against this foul blot upon the fair name of the State shall not die out too suddenly, the Governor will be constrained to oust the present set of incompetent Directors, and appoint men in their stead selected with an earnest desire to conduct the State Prison on principles of morality, strict discipline, and economy.

Land League State Convention.

We direct the attention of the various branches of the Land League throughout the State to the able address issued by the Executive of this city, on our next page. It explains fully the objects in view. This is the first call for a State Convention, and we earnestly hope that from it will emanate much to advance the good cause in every part of the State.

Already much has been accomplished. The interchange of ideas as to future management and prospects will contribute greatly to judicious co-operation in the future. The Convention will unite the scattered branches into one harmonious whole, and by thus uniting, strengthen the organization. The time of meeting is certainly propitious. The cause has been languishing here, whilst at home it is in the fever heat of fervor and enthusiasm. We are looking on idly while the men in the gap are grappling with the foe. This should not be the case. Never was the outlook for success in the conflict of the Land League in Ireland more encouraging, more cheerful and bright as at present. The people present a solid, united front. No deserters, no surrender. Neither Coercion, nor Arms Acts, soldiers, peelers, sheriffs, bailiffs, magistrates, rifles, Bumsh Asylum, a blind Asylum, a University and two Normal Schools. On the line of State education—that of our University and Normal Schools—is a confessed failure; another line of State education—that of our Prison—an acknowledged success. The Board of Regents have been forced to admit the State University was badly managed, and they are now trying what a change of officers and professors can do to remedy the evil. It is none too soon. While a hospital for the dying salaries approaching one hundred thousand a year, an attendance of less than two hundred pupils, and the graduation of one or two a year, is, indeed, a very poor showing. The Pope and the Land League.

In our last week's issue we published the splendid speech of Bishop Nulty of Meath, on the Land League agitation in Ireland, in which, referring to the conversation he had with the Pope, the latter used the significant words: "Assert your rights, lead your people and lead them on to victory." Since then, a more detailed account has reached us of the patriotic Bishop's speech, and it further proves the Vatican is in perfect harmony with the views of the great majority of the Bishops and priests of Ireland as to the justice of the demands of the Irish people on the Land Question. Replying to some allusions to his visit to Rome, Bishop Nulty said: "He had gone there, and he did imagine that he would be somewhat under a cloud for the part he had taken when he reached there, but he was mistaken, (cheers). He had written a pastoral before going there. A friend in Rome to whom he did not even send a copy of it, saw it, liked it, and translated it into Italian. It was presented to the Pope, who read it, and desired to be reminded of him when he came to Rome. On his arrival he had an interview with the Cardinal Prefect of the Propaganda. They were old friends. He had, his lordship found, formed some views on an imperfect knowledge of the land question, on the whole, not favorable to their organization. However, he was open to reason, and he did reason the matter closely over with him, and at the end he asked the Cardinal Prefect whether there was anything of disloyalty or treasonable or against the principles of morality in an organization founded on such principles? The Cardinal said there was not. When passing through England, going to Rome, he had had, previous to that, an interview with Cardinal Manning and talked over the subject. his Eminence authorized him to say in Rome that the sentiments he had expressed on this question were also his sentiments. When he came to have an interview with the Pope he found that his Holiness had no false ideas on the question. He is a practical man of the world, who lived amongst the people, and of deep sympathy with the people, of great insight and range of judgment, so that it is impossible to set him wrong. His Holiness received him most kindly and thanked him from his heart for the tidings he brought him of his people, and complimented him upon the letter he had written. For fully a quarter of an hour his Holiness never ceased speaking on the subject of his letter. He had but to listen and let him speak, for he could not get a chance to speak a word himself (cheers and laughter). The Pope was perfectly at home on all questions, and told him at close of the interview to tell his people to be patient within the law, assert their rights, and lead on to victory. Such was the substance of the address."

Editorial Correspondence.

Virginia City, Nevada—Its Silver-stored Mountains and the Mines Thence—Calistoga Institutions—The Sutro Tunnel, and Other Topics.

Although Virginia City is distant from Reno only 21 miles, yet the route along which the railroad runs is so circuitous and steep that it takes fully four hours to reach the latter city. The scenery in many places along the line is very picturesque, especially as the train moves along the narrow ledge of the mountain side, and the traveler beholds the Carson river meandering its way through the valley a couple of thousand feet below. Passing by Carson and a few places of lesser note, the train at length reaches an altitude of six thousand feet above the sea, and we were as in Virginia City, whose mines have made more Bonanza Kings and caused more excitement and more adventure than any other industry of modern days. In 1859 the discovery of silver-bearing rock was made by a couple of Irishmen—McLaughlin and O'Rielly—who were washing the soil for gold, and both of whom subsequently met fatal ends, the one becoming insane and the other dying by his own hand. At this time there were two other characters in this region who have become renowned in the history of the place, one of whom was after whom the city was named, and the other was Comstock, by whose name the richest silver mines in the world are at present designated.

From the date of the settlement of Virginia it rapidly grew, and at one time contained a population of more than 25,000, but this was in the hey-day of its prosperity, when every resident could count their prospective wealth by most fabulous amounts. Scarcely in the Union existed more enterprise at this period than the people among whom no less than $30,000,000 worth of ore was annually extracted from the vicinity of their residences. Vast enterprises were undertaken, spacious brick and stone edifices were erected, palatial residences were constructed, and a general desire manifested to make Virginia City one of the most opulent cities in the world. But, as the Bard of Avon says:

"There is a tide in the affairs of man," and that tide happened to be an ebb tide for this city. Mining stock, upon which all the hoped-for prosperity of the people was based, went down, the mines in many cases were closed up, the miners began to abandon the camp, stock-brokers and storekeepers began to seek new fields of industry, and thus Virginia City was reduced to its present meager proportions.

In common with every man, woman and child of this place, however, I candidly believe that Virginia City will again arise, phoenix like, from the ashes of its former greatness, and that its mineral wealth will be yet developed to such an extent as to astonish the world. Besides, there are millions of dollars invested in mining stocks here here which the owners must work or see it waste away amidst rust and ruin, hence capitalists will be compelled to keep prospecting for new veins of ore, and, in the meantime, they will get find a number of ore bodies that will regain for this city much of its former almost fabulous prosperity.

Among the most notable edifices in Virginia is the magnificent brick church of which was originally erected in 1868, but was destroyed during the great fire of 1875, when the principal portion of the city was reduced to ashes. In 1876 the present Rt. Rev. P. Manogue, then pastor of this place, set to work to reconstruct a temple worthy of the worship of God, and this beloved pastor has given the Catholics of this city a church that—for beauty of interior decoration and architectural symmetry—can scarcely be excelled on the Pacific coast, and in which the Catholics of Virginia City may well find the just pride they express regarding it.

"ST. MARY'S IN THE MOUNTAINS,"

THE SISTERS OF CHARITY

have three establishments here—a boarding and day school for young ladies, an Orphan Asylum and a Hospital. In former years these institutions flourished in prosperity of the place, but in recent times they have also had to feel the influence of business depression and reduced population, so that their usefulness is now comparatively speaking, but a faint shadow of what it was when their coffers were overflowing with gold, and their numerous inmates were in receipt of more than a competence for their support. The Sisters are all ladies of culture and refinement, and are among the most whole-souled and hospitable people I have met in my wanderings, and the very large accession which I made to the Monitor list, proves that they appreciate the benefits of Catholic literature, when our priest or respectable congregations than those who attended the 9 o'clock Mass in the church on Sunday last, would be rare to find, and the many evidences of Catholicity which I found in the houses I visited convince me that the Catholics of Virginia City have upon their hearts the true stamp of practical Catholic piety.

THE IRISH ELEMENT

predominates very largely in this community, and the manly spirit of the Celtic race is here demonstrated by three military companies, viz., the Emmet Guard, Montgomery Guard, and Sarsfield Guard. There are also several Irish National Civic Societies, and a splendid organization of the Land League, whose members evince the greatest enthusiasm in the cause of Ireland's future freedom. The Miners' Union is also an organization very numerous and influential, in which the Irish-American element is well represented. The society has a fine hall, an extensive library, and a commodious reading room for the benefit of its members, who are united upon the principle of self-preservation for their rights as skilled laborers, and for the succor and support of such members as may meet with accidents during the discharge of their dangerous duties.

THE CLERGY IN CHARGE of the church here are Rev. D. O'Sullivan, pastor, and Rev. Father Maguire, assistant, both of whom are kept constantly on duty attending to the spiritual wants of this city and adjacent places. On Sunday last Father O'Sullivan preached a very practical discourse on the duty of Catholic parents in having their children instructed in their religious belief, and also the obligation which rests upon Catholic parents of sending their children to Catholic schools when they are within reach of Catholic residences. It was a plain, practical discourse which could not fail of having a most salutary effect upon all parents who heard it—and God have mercy on the soul of that parent who will not "hear the Church" when she speaks to him concerning the salvation of the souls of his children.

GOLD HILL AND VICINITY.

Gold Hill is separated from Virginia City by a steep ridge, known as "The Divide," but, to all intents and purposes, the two places are one, as their mineral interests and commercial relations are identical. In former years there were a large number of Catholics residing in Gold Hill who have left behind them a very pretty frame church and a neat pastoral residence. At present, however, there are but few Catholics here, they having scattered elsewhere in order to find a market for their labor. Fathers Nulty and O'Kane minister to the spiritual wants of the Catholics here, and through their kind offices I was enabled to send the Monitor into many a household where Catholic was unknown.

A TRIP TO THE SUTRO TUNNEL.

Taking advantage of the kind invitation of Father O'Sullivan, who was called thither on duty, I visited the Sutro Tunnel, one of the grandest achievements of engineering skill in modern days. This tunnel is four miles in length, and taps the rich Comstock mines at a depth of two thousand feet. All the ore extracted from these lodes passes to the surface through this tunnel, paying a handsome royalty for the use of this subterranean roadway. Time did not permit of any examination of this herculean enterprise, which has its entrance on the side of a miniature mountain, at whose base is located the embryo city of Sutro, which, at one time, it was thought would rival Virginia City itself. But, like other prospective cities on this coast, its prosperity did not keep pace with its enterprise, and it now represents only a shadow of its former great expectations.

TIMES IN SUTRO.

In former days it was no extraordinary circumstance to have "a man for breakfast," in the shape of a miner laid stiffened through a drunken brawl or a gambling row, and the occurrences of the past week would seem to revive the old reputation of this rock-built city, there being an unusual number of shooting-scrapes, and some of them very disastrous. On Wednesday evening last a county official, named Dan Kelleher, was stabbed to death by an old resident named Hennessey, during a quiet which they got into through the passion of intoxication. Mr. Kelleher was a young man, greatly respected, and his funeral to the Catholic graveyard on the following Friday was one of the largest seen here for many years. Being a member of the Montgomery Guard, he was buried with military honors, details of members from the other military companies being in attendance. Decoration was also Recording Secretary of the Land League, the male and female members of which marched on foot to the graveyard. It was a pleasing sight to see so many hundred friends of the deceased marching in regular procession, thus attesting their regard for the deceased by some personal sacrifice, and also avoiding the useless expense of a hearse and a long line of carriages, whose inmates oftentimes look upon such occasions as the very place to have "a good time" at the expense of the afflicted and impoverished family of the deceased. All honor, then, to the Catholic men and women of Virginia who had the courage to overthrow this growing evil in Catholic communities, and I sincerely hope their example will be followed by Catholics everywhere, need we have seen the old time spirit of Catholic unity, and the manly spirit of the Celtic race is here demonstrated by three military companies, viz., the Emmet Guard, Montgomery Guard, and Sarsfield Guard. There are also several Irish National Civic Societies, and a splendid organization of the Land League, whose members evince the greatest enthusiasm in the cause of Ireland's future freedom. The Miners' Union is also an organization very numerous and influential, in which the Irish-American element is well represented. of the church here are Rev. D. O'Sullivan, pastor, and Rev. Father Maguire, assistant, both of whom are kept constantly on duty attending to the spiritual wants of this city and adjacent places. On Sunday last Father O'Sullivan preached a very practical discourse on the duty of Catholic parents in having their children instructed in their religious belief, and also the obligation which rests upon Catholic parents of sending their children to Catholic schools when they are within reach of Catholic residences. It was a plain, practical discourse which could not fail of having a most salutary effect upon all parents who heard it—and God have mercy on the soul of that parent who will not "hear the Church" when she speaks to him concerning the salvation of the souls of his children.

GOLD HILL AND VICINITY.

Gold Hill is separated from Virginia City by a steep ridge, known as "The Divide," but, to all intents and purposes, the two places are one, as their mineral interests and commercial relations are identical. In former years there were a large number of Catholics residing in Gold Hill who have left behind them a very pretty frame church and a neat pastoral residence. At present, however, there are but few Catholics here, they having scattered elsewhere in order to find a market for their labor. Fathers Nulty and O'Kane minister to the spiritual wants

BISHOP KEIPS GENEALOGY.

MARYSVILLE, June 27, 1881.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MONITOR:

Dear Sir:—Please request his genealogical tree from the "Bishop of all California," in order that you may in your next issue show or show to all whom it may concern his Apostolical succession. Archbishop Alemany can only trace his succession to St. Peter, a poor fisherman who left his wife, may God forgive or reward him a hundred-fold, whereas Bishop Kip, of all California, has no idea of leaving his own spouse "till death him do part," as per marriage promise. Poor Archbishop spouse never dies. His Grace has only one Immortal Spouse. But the leader than Richard Cœur de Lion yea, even 100 years more—and still she flourishes in Immortal youth, vigour, and the vigour of elements," etc. You know the rest better than.

Yours sincerely, MARYSVILLIAN.

CLOSING EXERCISES OF ST. MARY'S SCHOOL VIRGINIA CITY.

The seventeenth annual commencement exercises of St. Mary's Academy, Virginia City, came on Friday last, but in consequence of the lability of the Sisters to undertake the expense of a public exhibition, the exercises were entirely private this year, the only persons present being Rev. P. O'Sullivan Pastor of Virginia City, and Father Welly Pastor of Gold Hill. The pupils were examined, in their several studies, and proved by their efficiency that they had diligently applied themselves during the past term. At the conclusion of the examination Father O'Sullivan presented the following medals to the following young ladies: Miss Mary Dopson, of Lassen District, received the gold medal for Christian Doctrine; prizes and a gold medal in studies; Miss Mary E. O'Connell, of Gold Hill received the gold medal for music; Miss Birdie Malone received the gold medal for writing; and Miss Kate A. Murphy, of Aurora, Cal., was the recipient of the gold medal for ornamental penmanship. The gold medal awarded by the Sisters for drawing and painting, Miss M. Weber. The silver medal for regular attendance was won by Miss Maggie Lannan. Several books were distributed among the pupils for proficiency in their several classes. The exercises were interspersed with selections of vocal and instrumental music, many of the pupils evinving particular talent for this branch of education. In the departments of drawing, embroidery and needlework, the pupils displayed a degree of proficiency which is more than ordinary skill.

We hear that next year St. Mary's in the Mountains may be in a condition to hold its accustomed public exhibition, so that those interested in education may have an opportunity to see for themselves what can be done in Catholic institutions (possessing such capable teachers as the Sisters of Charity). Studies in this institution will be resumed on the first Monday in August.

NEW CHURCH AT ST. MIGUEL.

Another New Catholic Church for One of our Suburban Districts.

For a fortnight past the Archbishop of San Miguel and his accomplices, Mr. Isaac Archbishop, Esq., has concluded that there must soon be a Catholic church in that neighborhood. The Catholics of the place are delighted at the idea of having one, and many have already promised generous contributions. For the present, a priest from St. Peter's says Mass every Sunday at 9 o'clock, A.M., and holds sunday School in the afternoon at 2, in a small hall near the railway depot. But as this hall is altogether inadequate for the requirements of the congregation, the Archbishop has been taken to erect a suitable edifice before the July census sets in. The new district is divided from St. Paul's by the following boundary:—From the junction of the San Bruno Road and Mission Creek westerly, along the Creek to the Ocean Road; thence southerly to the Ocean Road Road, thence westerly and south-westerly along the road to the beach.

ST GERTRUDE'S ACADEMY, RIO VISTA

The banks of the Sacramento present no more desirable site for a city than that occupied by the town of Rio Vista. This prosperous town is on the elevated ground on the right bank of the Sacramento river, out of all danger of floods, and has back of it the rich wheat fields of Solano county to insure its continued prosperity. Nor do we look in vain for the marks of the hand of Providence, beside the warehouse, the hotel and the public school, stand the Catholic Church and the Convent of the Sisters of Mercy. The Convent is situated on the most elevated ground of the city, and commands a beautiful view of the surrounding country. In passing up the river, the first building that comes to view is St. Gertrude's; it seems to be projected in bold relief against the blue vault of the sky, an effect which seems to magnify the building many fold. A little farther on the beautiful spire of St. Joseph's church looms up with its golden cross glittering in the light of the setting sun. But these monuments of piety rilled with pious souls are a blessing. A few years ago, and there was no convent, no Catholic school, and the church was a compromise between the open air and a shed. But the right men have met in the right place, and the result has proved what the wisdom, energy and zeal of a pastor can accomplish for religion and education, when his efforts are seconded by large-hearted Catholic gentlemen.

Mr. Brunning is a gentleman possessed of impulses worthy of the highest admiration. Appreciating the necessity and the obligation of wealthy Catholics fostering religion and education, and, finding in Rev. Father McNamee the proper man to co-operate with, Mr. Brunning acted generously of the fruits of his honest industry to the noblest objects on earth—the Church and the Christian school. Some four years ago this good and generous man founded St. Gertrude's Academy, for the higher education of young ladies. Everything, from the donation of the ground to the furnishing of the building and the decoration of the chapel, bears his munificence and shrubbery, is due to the princely munificence of Mr. Brunning. The excellent management of the Sisters in charge soon became known throughout the State, and last session, owing to lack of accommodation, they were obliged to refuse several applications seeking the benefits of the school. This summer they commenced the erection of an additional wing to the building, the construction of which was sufficiently advanced to admit the holding of the last closing exercises on the 24th inst. The new wing is built of three stories high, mansard roof, and surrounded by an observatory, from which San Francisco, Stockton and Sacramento can be plainly seen on a clear day. The Rev. Mother hopes that the new wing will be completed and everything in readiness for re-opening by the 15th of August. Lots also conduct the Parochial schools, in which they have upwards of one hundred girls and boys. The examinations of the Sisters and the closing exercises were held on the 21st inst. His Grace, the Most Rev. Archbishop Alemany, gave the Sacrament of Confirmation to the children of the school, after which the prelate was assisted at the examinations during the remainder of the day. The examination of studies was conducted by Rev. Brother Humphrey, of St. Mary's College, assisted by Rev. Brother Joseph, and Professor Taaffe. The high class was examined in Rhetoric, geometry, conic sections, the constitution of the United States, and an advanced course in Christian doctrine. The examination was a searching one, and the answering was such as to do credit to the pupils, as well reflects the greatest credit on the promoters and Sisters of Mercy.

The evening was devoted to the exhibition exercises, which were instructive and entertaining to a high degree. The music was delightful, and a superior order. Miss Carmody, who won the gold medal for excellence in Christian doctrine, fully competes for a like distinction in any country of music, for she seems to be the very soul of the art. But the chief features of the exhibition were the reading of a comedy and the drama entitled "Marie Antoinette." This drama was elevated, instructive and interesting, and the Sisters of Mercy. It is a beautiful composition; it portrays the best feelings of the human heart, and shows what an association the educated Christian mother is capable of when in deepest affliction. In following the fate of the heroine, the audience were enabled to make many wise reflections on the duties of rulers and the responsibilities Rio Vista is deserving of particular mention in this connection, for the character of Marie Antoinette as Queen of France with the address to the Parliament of Paris, by the women, and in the farewell address to the Princess Royal, by the Queen, were well rendered by Misses Tuffts and Miss McMahon. The music of Miss Dwyer was good, and the music of Carmody, very well composed, well delivered, and well received by the audience.

The Rev. Father McNamee read the list of honors, and the Archbishop conferred them on the deserving. The Rev. Father McNamee delivered a beautiful address. His Grace then delivered a beautiful address, and said, Rio Vista is the home of the heart, he would wish to express the pleasure he felt in being called upon to assist at the exercises of St. Gertrude's Academy. He spoke of the examinations, and congratulated the young ladies on the manner in which they acquitted themselves in the study of Rhetoric. He spoke of the benefits and charms of the Christian education of girls, and congratulated the good Sisters on their great success, and the people of Rio Vista on the fortune of having such a institution in studies; Miss Mary E. O'Connell, of Gold Hill received the gold medal for music; Miss Birdie Malone received the gold medal for writing; and Miss Kate A. Murphy, of Aurora, Cal., was the recipient of the gold medal for ornamental penmanship. The gold medal awarded by the Sisters for drawing and painting, Miss M. Weber. The silver medal for regular attendance was won by Miss Maggie Lannan. Several books were distributed among the pupils for proficiency in their several classes. The exercises were interspersed with selections of vocal and instrumental music, many of the pupils evinving particular talent for this branch of education. MONITOR MENTION.

St. Ignatius College Preparatory department will open on Friday July 1st.

—The comet is the latest of the hour, as well as an enigma to astronomers, whom it has taken completely by surprise. What next?

—The Regents of the State University have elected W. J. Reid, President, and Rev. J. H. C. Bonte, Secretary of that institution.

—Thomas C. Maher has been selected to read the Declaration of Independence on the Fourth of July.

—Mayor Kalloch has approved the tax levy at $1 25, the 15c being for the benefit of Spring Valley.

—The American ship Franconia was wrecked last Saturday on the Farallones Islands. All hands saved. Cause alleged, no fur whelks heard from the islands.

—The question now agitating the public mind is what has become of the $224,000 raised by taxes last year for the Water Company, and which the latter did not receive.

—On Monday evening, Captain J. H. McMenomy was unanimously re-elected Captain of Company C, Third Infantry Battalion. This makes his fifth term.

—The new church at the Boys' Orphanage, near Santa Rosa, was dedicated last Wednesday, the 29th inst., by the Most Rev. Archbishop Alemany, and Confirmation administered to a number of children. Full particulars last week.

—Our Fourth of July celebration this year will be above of much of its military display, the first regiment gone to Santa Cruz, and the second gone out of service. Brass buttons at a discount.

—Studies will be resumed in the Preparatory and Intermediate classes of the Sacred Heart College on Tuesday July 5th; in the Commercial and Collegiate classes on What Mothers should Teach their Children.

Teach the children to pray for the souls of the departed. Cultivate in them a love for the saints in Purgatory by offering up their Holy Communions for them and frequently asking God to have mercy on their souls. If no other motive prompted the parents to this intire devotion towards the poor souls, their own necessities should inspire them to inculcate a rich pious practice. They are aware that in all human probability they will die before their children, and will be in need of prayers for their souls in the next life. To whom can they look for succor in their purgatorial sufferings, if not to their children? Will they not, then, teach their children so to pray that they can assist them and give heed to their plaintive cry: "Have mercy upon me at least, you, my children, for the hand of the Lord is heavy upon me." Where is the child that would not run to the assistance of a suffering parent upon earth? Will that child be heedless to these sufferings, so greatly intensified in the next life? Not if the child is taught that it can help the souls in Purgatory, and that teaching is put in practice by the parent, and encouraged in the child. As you will be held responsible before God for the souls of your children, so teach them how to help your soul when the hand of the Lord shall, perhaps, be heavy upon you for your short comings. The Mother of the Maccabees should be a model for all Catholic mothers.

Killing Gophers.

Writes a correspondent of the Rural Press: Take a piece of carrot; make it round, about the size of an India rubber; cut it into halves; pulverize some strychnine upon the back of a plain white table knife, very fine; spread it on, each half to the outer edge; very little will do; put the halves together and run a piece of wood skewer fashion through them to hold them together, and roll it down a gopher-hole. If you get tired of waiting to see a fork open, open the hole one closed up with a large spoon. The dose is a dead shot. I had a patch of carrots, and it astonished all the gophers in the neighborhood, but the runs are so full of dead gophers that I can't induce one to call up a new one. I have not seen a sign for weeks.

—Professor Roberts tells us that fifty bushels of wood-ashes per acre increased the yield of grass more than any other manure, while ground bone improved the clover.

—The use of manure in which potash and phosphates are the only ingredients seems to be the only preventive so far known for potato diseases. Barn yard manures and guano aggravate the trouble.

—To prepare night-soil for use on land mix it thoroughly with any dry absorbent, as powdered charcoal, dry muck, road dust or sifted coal ashes, so that all lumps may be broken fine, and then apply it as any other manure.

Family Fun.

How to Live to be Ninety.

Mr. Rufus Wathersby Hicks, of Oakhook, asks the secret of his good health. In response to my inquiry as to the methods by which he has managed to keep himself in such condition, he has written me the following letter, which I publish for the benefit of the public. Mr. Hicks says:

"In the first place I have always been careful to sleep with plenty of air in my bedroom. I regard this as a matter of vital importance. The practice of sleeping in a vacuum will gradually undermine the strongest constitution. I have found great advantage, too, in sleeping in bed, and not on the washboard or across the towel-rack. My grandfather used to say that the towel-rack was even more dangerous to sleep on than the mantlepiece.

"Upon rising in the morning I always jump at once into the bath-tub, no matter how cold the weather is; and I sit there thinking whether I shall turn the water on or not. Generally I conclude not. But the exercise in climbing in and out of the tub does me much good. Before breakfast I mean an hour or so in pursing. I have become so skilful now that I can tell an adverb clear across the street, and no amount of disguise can hide a participle from a person like me. Sometimes, when I weary of grammar, I take a quiet game of 'Pussy wants a corner,' or practice looking cross-eyed at the clock. This last amusement always gives me an appetite.

"But a moderate breakfast is best. I mean doesn't want more than two or three watermelons, a third quarter of lamb, a peck or two of oysters, and a bucket (a small bucket) of pickles for his first meal. Eat slowly. Give at least a minute to a water melon, and where gunwads are introduced in the hash, be sure to spit out the stones. [N. B.—This is not clear, but Mr. Hicks undoubtedly means well.—M. Anzler.]

"After eating, the system needs a rest. Go off to some quiet place, like the rain-water cistern, or the chimney-flue, and try to compose my mind. Sometimes I sing. It is admirable for strengthening the lungs, and the chimney-flue develops the sound wonderfully. Last Wednesday I sang 'Home, sweet Home' up the flue so effectively that it brought out the fire brigade, and there Mrs. Hopkinson's hired girl into fits." [N. B.—The old man's mind appears to be wandering here, but he is evidently trying to tell the truth.—M. Anzler.]

"A little later in the day you want exercise to stimulate the circulation. Sometimes I carry the piano up and down stairs two or three times, or I open and shut my umbrella seventeen or eighteen hundred times, or brush my hair for a couple of hours, or go out and dig potatoes with a lead pencil. I used to spank the baby, but I have no baby now (small enough to spank. My youngest child is forty-seven, and has rolls, and is in the legislature." [N. B.—If he is in the legislature it is positively certain that a spanking would do him good. But I do not understand the reference to the hair. It is not pertinent to the subject.—M. Anzler.]

"And now, in my old age, I look back upon the years of a well spent life, and as I wheel myself about my garden in my wheel-barrow, looking at the logarithmus growing upon my vines and watching the propositus climbing upon the trellises basking in the sunshine, while the policans gambol about the——"

But this is enough. Mr. Hicks is gradually ceasing to be lucid. Paliesus never gambol; and I have some doubts about that wheelbarrow performance; but the reader who wishes to live till ninety and become a hoary old fellow may study Hicks's quatrain possibly with profit.

Our Young Folks.

A Travelled Dog.

A few people who travel on the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway know what a distinguished character has a free pass on every branch of the line, of which for several years he has taken daily advantage. It is between two and three years ago that a fox-terrier, big in bone, and not over well-bred, jumped into a train that was leaving Brighton for Horsham, and settled himself in the guard's carriage. Little notice was taken of him at first, but after a time he began to be a person of great interest. No one knew where he came from nor whom he belonged; but every day he was ready for an early start in an early train. Sometimes he went to Portsmouth, sometimes to Brighton, sometimes only to nearer stations; but the most remarkable part of his arrangements was that he always got to Brighton in time to go by the last train to Lewes, where he always slept, leaving again by the first train in the morning. When the friend from whom I first heard this story (and who vouches for the truth of it) last heard of Jack he still continued this practice, and always spent the night at Lewes station. About a year and a half ago the London, Brighton, and South Coast Company began to look upon him as one of their regular servants, and presented him with a collar bearing this inscription—"Jack, London, B., and S. Coast Railway Company." My friend told me that on one occasion, some months ago, he traced Jack's movements on one especial day, and probably it was a good sample of many another. He arrived from Brighton by a train reaching Horsham at 10.40; then he got out for a minute, but went on by the same train to Handcross. He left the train and went to a public house not far from the station, where a biscuit was given to him, and after a little rest he took a later train to West Grinstead, where he spent the afternoon, returning to Brighton in time for the last train to Lewes. He was rather fond of the Portsmouth line, but never, I believe, has come so far as London. He generally takes his place on or by the guard's wheel, and sits looking out of the window. It would be very interesting to know in what the fascination of this perpetual railway travel consists. It certainly shows an immense amount of instinct and observation, and the regularity and punctuality of Jack's daily life are a lesson to many a two legged traveller. Whether he considers himself sub-guard, or director, or general overseer, no one can tell, but there is, it seems, an idea of duty in his movements; what he has to do (or thinks he has to do) he does faithfully, and so far is a telling example to his fellow-travellers on the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway.

A "Subscriber" writes respecting Jack:—"I have known him four years, and can corroborate every word in the paragraph, with one exception, and that is that Jack knows London Bridge and Victoria Stations as well as I do, and especially the refreshment rooms. He has private apartments at Croydon, Three Bridges, Tunbridge Wells, and Eastbourne. The last place Jack got into a North-Western train at Croydon by mistake, changed at Willesden, and went to Edinburgh with a guard he knew. He also goes to Dieppe occasionally. When he travelled with me he did not object to riding first-class, but it uniform.

Wide-Awake Boys.

General Grant is reported as having told a story lately to illustrate how much circumstances had to do with making a man's fortune. When a boy, he stated, his mother one morning found herself without butter for breakfast, and sent him to borrow some from a neighbor. Going into the house without knocking, young Grant overheard a letter read from the son of his neighbor, who was then at West Point, stating that he had failed in examination, and was coming home. He got the butter, took it home, and without waiting for breakfast ran to the office of the Congressman for that district. "Mr. Hamer," he said, "will you appoint me to West Point?" "No, sir—there is there, and has three years to serve." "But suppose he should fail, will you send me?" Mr. Hamer hesitated. "If he don't go through no use for you to try, Ulysses." "Promise me you will give me the chance, Mr. Hamer, say how." Mr. Hamer promised. The next day the defeated lad came home, and the Congressman laughed at Ulys sharpness, gave him the appointment. "Now," said Grant, "it was my mother's being out of butter that made me general and President." But he was mistaken. It was his own shrewdness to see the chance and promptness to seize it that urged him upwards. Another instance, where the success was not so great, occurs to us. A lad of sixteen, shop-boy in a Western town, saved $300 in 1860. Going down the street, one day during the winter, when the South-ern States were seceding one by one, he heard a passer-by remark, "North Carolina has gone out." At the same moment his eye fell on a barrel of turpentine exposed for sale. "No North Carolina, no turpentine," thought he. He ran to the bank, draw out his precious $300, and invested it all in turpentine. Before the year was out he realized enough to give him a good capital with which to start in business. But how many boys in the place of those two would have moved promptly, acting, gaining nothing but the better and the news:—Companion.

Boarding the British Lion.

The Irishmen in Great Britain have again been doing good service in bringing the Irish question to the very doors of Englishmen. The attention of politicians in England has been directed during the week to two elections, and in each of them the Irish vote has been an important item. The Knaresborough contest was decided on the 12th inst., and the Irish electors pursued the same policy as their countrymen did in Coventry, and with an equally favorable result. The Liberal candidate, it was well known, held opinions strongly opposed to the convictions of the Irish portion of the constituency. It was decided to oppose him, and Mr. Arthur O'Connor, M. P., travelled specially from London to assist his countrymen. The result was that the Government supporter was defeated by a majority of 41. This result is due of one sent to the Liberal party, as at the general election the representation of the town was wrenched from the Tories after a hard struggle, by a very small majority. In the Preston contest, where the election has not yet been decided, the Irish vote has played a very important part. The Liberal candidate is Mr. Vates Thompson, and he has readily met the views of the Irish electors.

Archbishop Vaughan, of Sydney.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH vs. MODERN THOUGHT.

Godless Education and Its Evil Works.

Archbishop Vaughan, of Sydney, in his Lenten Pastoral Letter, says:

If we take the Papal Chair as a centre, and cast our eyes round the world, we shall find that the Catholic Church is engaged in almost every country in a heavy conflict with her enemies. The heroine of the past, which represented endless endeavors of antagonistic forces, have gradually amalgamated, and instead of having to contend with many, yet isolated foes, the Church has now, practically, to encounter only one. It is true that units of the same color differ, yet they are but shades of difference, and represent in reality the same thing.

Nay do not occupy themselves, as of old, in denying this dogma or that; they no longer call in question isolated propositions; they do not think of setting up purer or more simple creeds. Such methods imply a certain faith in the supernatural and in revealed religion. Now all this, we may say broadly, has passed away, and one aim of "modern thought" is to level the Catholic Church with the ground, and to make a clear way for the liberty of the passions and the uncontrolled display of the pride of man.

It is the same in so-called Catholic countries as in Protestant. Indeed, if possible, the conflict is more unrelenting in the former than in the latter, inasmuch as Protestantism has a certain affinity with, and may be said to be the parent of, the spirit of the present age; whilst Catholicism is, and ever has been, and must be, diametrically opposed to it. In Republican France the governing authorities have been acting as if their very existence depended on the destruction of religion. Not only have the Regular Orders been driven out, but in some places the very crucifixes and emblems of Christian faith have been beaten off the walls and from their pedestals with sticks, and carted away as so much rubbish to fill ditches and mend the public roads. The Government of Italy—that Italy which ought to be the most Catholic country in the world—treats the religion of the people as an enemy of the State; and the action of those in power is calculated to weaken, and to bring to naught, were it possible, that great civilization which has placed the Italian Peninsula in many ways at the very head of European greatness. In Germany the same policy of antagonism has been persisted in, and the Imperial Chancellor imagines, or affects make believe, that the great Empire of Germany cannot be considered safe so long as the Catholic religion is tolerated in the fatherland. Even Belgium, which, imitating the liberty-loving spirit of our race, rejoices in a kindred freedom, unable to resist the universal pressure, has disgraced the Catholic name by treating the popular religion as if it were the greatest enemy of progress, and the main drawback to the advancement of the world.

What is going on in Europe is producing its effect all over the civilized globe. In those where the action of "free-thought," directed by the passions, is producing the same result; and the great tide of human energy, as represented by "advanced ideas," is breaking down old landmarks and threatens to submerge the civilization of the Cross, and that venerable creed which has been the consolation as well as the hope of millions amongst the best of men. The forces which are operating in the country at home, and are disturbing the peace of nations, are not without their influx in the land of our adoption. Each year as it passes adds largely to the army of unbelief. The churches and sects that sprang out of the sixteenth century are gradually losing their hold on the public mind; they are looked upon as possessing no genuine power by the leaders of modern thought. They are regarded as illogical when viewed as exponents of dogmatic creeds and supernatural religions, and if they are treated with any tenderness it is because they are said to serve as useful seminaries for infidelity. With them the powers of the world enter into no internecine battle. A word of contempt or of compassion, a smile of amusement or of incredulity is all they have to suffer from the leaders of "advanced ideas," who look upon them, at best, as harmless minicries of something far more formidable than themselves, and which exerts a real influence over the consciences of men.

There is but one real antagonist which bars the way to so-called progress, and that antagonist is the Catholic Church. If she were once disposed of, the ideas of the most advanced of modern thinkers would find no obstacle to their realization, and the old world notions of supernatural religion, of the divinity and atonement of our Saviour, and indeed, finally, of the existence of God Himself, would gradually, it is thought, melt away into the forgetfulness of the past. Living here as we do, at the end of the world, it takes time for European thought to permeate amongst us. Were the public teachings of the leaders of more advanced ideas in Europe to be paraded amongst our colonists, much scandal would be the consequence; and yet our small world is steadily advancing in the direction of unbelief. It is merely behind the age, but is day by day making good its steps in the direction of European infidelity. What a few years ago would have shocked the public conscience now produces little effect. Lectures are advertised and delivered striking at the very heart of Christianity, and attended by large audiences of approving disciples in the centre of our greatest cities, and the general tendency proves that public thought in Australia is being carried along by the same wave which is disturbing and sickening the old countries at home. In Europe, where the tide is more advanced, expression is more startling.

The Church is the one witness, her voice is now what it was in the catacomb of St. Callixtus. Her glory is the reproach of semper eadem. And since the world, or "modern thought," which represents the new-world form of human passion and pride, cannot convert, or hoodwink, or diplomatise, or terrify the Church out of her unpragmatic position, it is attempting all over the world to weaken her hold upon the public conscience, and, gradually, especially by means of the education of the young, to take the generations of the future wholly out of their hands. Send a child to school where religion is not the basis of education, and that child will become a man without basis of religion. Send a nation to such a school, and that nation will be as the man is—devoid and divested of the love of Christ and of the fear of God. If the leaders of "modern thought" succeed in bringing up a generation of children to manhood and womanhood without religion, they will have done more to corrupt the world than all the immoralities of the Roman Empire.

You know how strenuously we have demanded the practically free system of education for which we all are taxed, and for which we have all to pay. You know how much opposition, and what strong expressions of disapproval on the part of our opponents, such a course has led to on the same of. . . You see how the clear enunciation of the truth has dissipated the cloud of confusion in which some were lost; and how now we have emerged out of the cloud and out of the sea, and are determined to let the world go its way, and to make any and every sacrifice for the preservation of that glorious religion which yet may, in God's good time, constitute to herself the affection of our fellow-colonists.

The future of the country is to be found not in Parliament or great meetings of the people, but in the schools. If you would know what sort of Catholicity will reign in this land in fifty years' time, all you have to do is to interrogate the schoolmaster—to examine what is the character of the schools in which the Catholic population receives its education. If you children are sent to State schools, they will become State children; and, like the State, their boast will be, when they grow up, that they are not clogged or hampered by any religion at all, and that their one object in this life—for they will not believe in any other—is to enjoy themselves, and to avoid anything that may be the cause of pain. If they be sent to Protestant schools, they will become Protestants; if to Catholic schools, well conducted, they will mature and grow up much to the religion of their fathers. Dearly beloved, we are speaking in general and the main; we are not dealing with exceptional cases. There is no rule without its exception. Some children, who have been educated strictly Protestants, have been Catholics later on in life. Catholics who have received a careful education in the family, at school, and in Catholic universities, have before now turned infidels or atheists. And yet, against such exceptions, the general tendency to turn out a generation of Catholic men and women is to give that generation, when young, a careful training in schools expressly in harmony with, and under the guidance of, the Catholic religion. The desperate effort which per fas et nefas our opponents are making to get hold of Catholic children, ought to be enough of itself to convince serious minds of the immence importance of early training when there is question of the religious future of a people.

The schools throughout the world are now the main point of attack and the Church throughout the world is in harmony with herself. She may suffer fine and exile, but she may not prevaricate. She was not instituted to make money, but to make martyrs; not to divide the spoils of this world, but in the face of the powerful to proclaim the Truth. So she gathers her children the closer around her the more the storm rages; and willingly suffering persecution for Justice's sake, she consolidates her strength, conciliates the love of Catholic parents, and uses the tyranny and cruelty of her enemies to strengthen and tighten the bond of her unity and the cords of her peace. Such, dearly beloved, is our case in this country. Never was the Catholic body in this colony so united as at present. This comes to us from all quarters. The traditions of the faith are deeply ingrained in the hearts of our faithful people. In the noisy city and in the distant bush it is the same. All who have watched the battle, with its confusion of dust, have great pity seen the Church emerge in her beautiful proportions and present herself to the eye of Catholic and Protestant alike as something not of this world or of this world's policy, but as some divine Prophetess, in dazzling gold and silver and flattery, announced a great principle, gathered her children together, and, having shaken herself free from evil, walked the way, pure and undefiled, of God's commandments in spite of the efforts of her enemies to make her compromise her position and betray the essential interests of the faith. And why, dearly beloved children in Jesus Christ, have we been dwelling on these thoughts in the Lenten Pastoral? Why have we been reviewing the ubiquitous battle that is going on between the Church and "modern thought" all over Christendom? We have done so, first because it is an immense help to us to identify our spiritual position with that imperial universal Church to which we belong. We are, each of us, one of a vast society, living by one life, and pursuing one policy. We are encouraged in our struggles by the thought that we are not alone in the fray. The great army throughout the world is actively engaged with the enemy along the whole line. When we think of this we feel that we must not be the first to turn traitors or cowards; but that we must conduct ourselves gravely, and do our part to sustain the glorious reputation of the Church of Christ, militant on earth; secondly, because we have a sacred trust to realize, the fact that we have been doing has been simply our duty, and an elementary obligation of our position—one of the units of the episcopal office, to preserve inviolate the deposit of faith. As the honor of his wife is dear to a husband, and is jealously guarded by him; even more dear, if possible, and more jealously guarded, if it can be so, is the faith of the Church which is especially intrusted to the protection of the Bishop. We are not only one of the vast company of Catholics spread over the world, but we are also strictly one in a point of vital moment with the teachings of our Saviour Head, and with the practice of some thousand Bishops who compose the hierarchy of the Catholic Church. Thirdly, we are fully persuaded that those very virtues, which we have more especially to practise during Lent, are highly calculated to arm us against the tendency of the present age, to open our eyes to see our duty towards the rising generation, and to give us strength and self-sacrifice enough to perform that duty. Let us, then, often meditate, during these forty days, on the great Spiritual Empire to which we belong; encouraging in our minds a profound sense of thankfulness that we are members of so glorious a society; and think of how we can do our part towards strengthening its hold and perpetuating its power in the land of our adoption. Let us often reflect on our duties towards the future of the Church in this land, and towards the immortal souls of these little children who depend entirely upon our action as regards their Christian education.

LIFE OF THE Blessed Jordan of Saxony,

SECOND GENERAL OF THE ORDER OF FRIAR-PREACHERS.

—[WRITTEN FOR THE MONITOR.]

CHAPTER VI.

"The feast of St. Severin (October 23d), was the day of his heavenly birth, he thus continues, "and he, leaving this life, died to the world, but was born to God. The night of October 23d, season as the bell had rung for Matins, I went to see him before going to choir. Having found him gasping for breath, and already in his last agony, I asked him if he wished to receive Extreme Unction, he answered that he earnestly desired it. We wished to carry out his desires, before saying Matins. He seemed rather to give himself the Sacrament than to receive it from others, for he said the prayers most devoutly. After the Unction we went down, to the choir, and said the Office of nine lessons in honor of St. Severin, patron of Cologne. I was struck with their promptness, and inwardly applied them to our Henry, who was on the point of entering into heaven. Immediately my eyes were filled with tears; they fell by torrents, and I experienced an inexpressible charm. Having ended, I found him speaking to God, and to God, in transports of joy, singing, inciting himself and the others to the desire of the heavenly land, full of distaste of this sad place of exile, consoling the Fathers who stood around, and saying to them: "O my Fathers, my soul is dilated upon you." At these words his soul started up, he began to sing, and to repeat often and tenderly this invocation: "Holy Virgin, make us worthy of the heavenly bride." Then he said to those, who already shone like stars in the sky and like torches in the world, 'The Lord has chosen you for his inheritance.' It was with such and other like words, by desire of death and by exhortions to live holily, that this blessed soul prepared to depart. At the moment when the Lord called him, and when he was already begun the attacks of the enemy, who tries to bruise our heel, he repeated those words of Jacob: 'God shall be with me, and shall keep me in the way by which I walk, and shall give me bread to eat, and raiment to put on. And I shall return prosperously to my Father's house, and the Lord shall be my God,' (Genesis, chap. 28, v. 20-21), 'and the Cross of Christ my standard.'

He continued some time thus, and added: 'The prince of this world draws near, but he will be powerless against me.' After saying these and other words no less remarkable, he entered into his agony, and he began to make the recommendation of his soul, to moan and weep. Our prayers were broken by sobs, and sometimes interrupted by a mournful silence."

After the death of this, his dearest friend on earth, he continued his journey to Paris, and presided at the General Chapter held in that city June 7, 1226.

CHAPTER VII.

These two journeys give us some idea of how his life was spent. But his wanderings were not confined to journeys to and from between Paris and Bologna; he even went as far as England. In four hours the quarrel having arisen between the townsmen and the students of Paris, the course of studies was stopped, and many thousands of students crossed the channel to study at Oxford. Jordan went also, and there he received man learned Englishmen into the Order, among whom was Robert Bacon, then an old man full of knowledge and holiness, and Richard Fishacre, who was so dear to Bacon that he could not part from him. He was the first English Dominican who commentated on the Book of Sentences of Peter Lombard.

Many beautiful anecdotes are told of these journeys. Thus we read that when traveling he was accustomed to spend the whole of his time in prayer, at least, when not speaking to the Brothers who accompanied him. Sometimes, as he walked along the road, he sang the hymn "Jesu Nostra Redemptio," or the "Salve Regina"; sometimes, all absorbed in devotion and inward joy, he strayed from the road and lost his way, but no one ever saw him troubled about it; on the contrary, he consoled his companions. "Be calm," he would say, "there is but one road about which we should be conscious—the road to heaven."

Passing from Lombardy into Germany, he once came to a village among the mountains called Urastia. He had with him two Friars and a secular clerk, who, later on, joined the Order. Overcome with fatigue, and famishing for food, they went into an inn, kept by a man called Untha, and asked him to prepare them something to eat. He answered that he could not, for several travelers had passed that way already and had eaten all he had, except two loaves, which he had laid aside for himself and his family. The Father answered: "Serve us what you have because we are in urgent need of food." Then the host brought the two loaves, which, in truth, were of the smallest, and Blessed Jordan having blessed them, began to give them away in pieces to the poor, who, hearing of the arrival of strangers, had come together in the hope of getting an alms! This appeared very singular conduct to the inn-keeper, who cried out in haste: "What are you doing? Have you forgotten that no more bread can be had here, and that the doors have been purposely shut to bind the poor from coming in?" But for his whole answer Jordan ordered the doors to be opened still wider, and calmly continued his alms. Now, the number of the poor was about thirty, and to each of them he gave so large a piece, that what one received would have been sufficient for all, yet he and his companions satisfied their hunger, and there remained a goodly quantity for the host and his family. Untha seeing this miracle, said: "Truly this man is a saint of God," and he refused to take any payment, but gave a flask of wine to the secular clerk to help them on their way.

Another anecdote will not be out of place here, although it is somewhat of a humorous character. Traveling in France he was one day received by a pious lady, whose husband, however, was not at all inclined to hospitality, especially towards Religious. Blessed Jordan and his companions were seated at table with the lady, when her husband came in. He took his place with a bad grace, not being pleased to find them there, and kept a dogged silence, thus wishing to show them that they were his guests by sufferance. After a while the servants brought a very choice wine, and enraged by this mark of attention to men he disliked, he called to his servants: "Go, wretch! and get some better wine than this; bring that which is in such a place in the cellar," indicating a particular barrel which he knew was so sour that it was no longer good enough for drink, and he ordered the purpose to annoy his wife, and to rent his spleen on the Friars.

The servants did as they were bid, and brought the wine; but, contrary to his wishes, it was excellent. The master of the house, beside himself with rage, said: "Why have you not drawn from the barrel I told you to?" The servant answered that he had done so, and went again to draw with the same result. Then the man, whose passion was now unbounded, went down himself into the cellar, tasted the wine from the barrel, and found it excellent. Then, seeing the miracle which God had worked to show the sanctity of his guest, he completely changed, and he who, up till then, had cled his wife and his servants by his hospitality to the Friars, now begged her in his love for them, and even urged her on to give them alms.

LIMERICK PRISON, May 20th, 1881.

MY DEAR MR. LEAHY,—We had a laugh when I handed Mr. Heffernan your letter. I am heartily pleased to hear from you and from so many other parties, that the Land League has improved in magnitude during our enforced absence. I hope to God it will long continue so, as I am confident that it is the most powerful organization that ever Ireland had, and it continues to do merits the most I admire the wisdom of its founders. You will probably see before this reaches you that the Land Law (Ireland) Bill has passed its second reading by a majority of 176 notwithstanding that Mr. Parnell walked out of the House of Commons when broken by sobs, and sometimes interrupted by a mournful silence."

After the death of this, his dearest friend on earth, he continued his journey to Paris, and presided at the General Chapter held in that city June 7, 1226.

ROMAN CORRESPONDENCE.

ROME, May 30, 1881.

THE VATICAN.—Mgr. Kirby, Bishop-Elect of Lita, in private audience presented to the Pope Peter Pence amounting to £145, on behalf of the Bishop, clergy and faithful of Achonry diocese.

Monsignor Stonor in private audience introduced to his Holiness Sir Charles Fredrick Smythe, the Hon. Lady Smythe, and the Hon. Mrs. Pereira.

On Sunday among those admitted to the Pope's private Mass were the Misses Seymour (recent converts), nieces of Sir Chas. Seymour, and Miss Fane.

On the 23rd the Pope gave special audience to a deputation of the Pontifical Academy of the Nuovi Lincei, consisting of the President, Count Cavallucana, the Secretary, Cavaliere Stefano Michele De Rossi, and Professor Azzarelli. On the same day his Holiness received the President of the Pontifical Academia Tiberina, Commendatore Cappoccini de Conti Guarna, and the ex-Presidents of the same Society. Monsignors Stefano Ciccolini, Agostino Bartolini, Commendatore Giulio Starbini, Professor Lorenzo Respighi and Mgr. Luigi Tripepi. It was the custom previous to 1871 for the Academia Tiberina on the annual election of its President, to coin three commemorative medals, one for the Pope, another for the Vatican Museum, and a third for the Academy. This custom, interrupted since 1871, was this year resumed, and the actual President now presented to Leo XIII. the medals for the past omitted years, as well as for the year 1881.

THE GERMAN PILGRIMS.—On the 26th Ascension Day, the German pilgrims, headed by Prince Charles de Louvenstein, were received in audience in the Sala Ducale. The Pope on the hall at a few minutes after 12 o'clock, attended by the Majordomo and Maestro di Camera; Monsignor Cataldi, Prefect of Ceremonies, and all the officers of his court, and accompanied by Cardinals Di Pietro, Ferrieri, Howard, Chiandi, Lecchowski, Frusolin, Nina, Alimonda, Jacobini, Sanguigni, Hasoun, Mertel, Sbarretti, De Falloux, Pellegrini, Pecci and Hergenwother, Monsignor Pallotti, and a number of prelates. The Princess of Thurn and Taxis, who had previously been received in audience by the Pope, was present, having been conducted to a seat by Mgr. Cataldi. Lady Herbert of Lea was also among those privileged to witness this audience. After the Pope took his seat on the throne, the pupils of the German College sang a hymn in honor of Leo XIII., and the address of the pilgrims, which was in Latin, was read by Prince Lowenstein. His Holiness replied in the same language in the following terms:

"If We always embrace with paternal love and benevolence those sons of the Catholic Church, of whatever nation, who resort to Us from all parts of the world, We must rejoice, beloved children, in the same way with exceeding affection, say with even greater mental joy. For We see before Us and We address Catholics who have come hither from various parts of Germany, and whom the fierce storm excited against the Church has already deprived of the fruits and benefits of peace. Notwithstanding you were not broken in spirit, and while ready to brave and endure the harshest persecutions, you yet stedy how to succor with your united strength the afflicted condition of religion in Germany, and you also show yourselves prepared with great firmness and consistency both to adhere to the Apostolic Chair and to the Apostolic See and to manifest obedience to Our will in all things, not only in words but in deeds.

"From your presence here, beloved children, We therefore receive exceeding pleasure, and We congratulate you heartily on the accomplishment of your pilgrimage to Rome, undertaken in behalf of religion. For here, where the sacred remains of the chief of the Apostles are revered with especial devotion, and where many ancient Christian monuments bear witness to the combats and victories of martyrs, it is natural for bands of pious pilgrims to feel their strength increased and their courage sensibly raised by the hope of similar victories.

"And now We will say a few words upon the topics which especially affect you; We are indeed moved by the bitter evils, just related by you, which oppress the Catholics, and especially the pastors of souls in your country and at the same time We grievously deplore the miserable condition of the Catholic religion in Germany, which has prevailed ever since the Church, taking her liberty through means of new laws, became subject to foreign domination. And, as you were pleased just now to remind Us, We immediately commenced negotiations with the august German Emperor and with others whose influence was greatest with him for the restoration of peace. We were moved to this course as well by reason of Our office as by Our desire to provide for the eternal salvation of all the faithful in Christ, and, lastly, by the assured hope that the restoration of concord with the Catholic Church would be of immense advantage to the whole German Empire. And, therefore, no doubt could affect Our mind in this matter that We should show Ourselves easy and indulgent in establishing peace. Nevertheless, by Our Apostolic office and by virtue of the oath by which We are bound, We are prevented from ratifying anything which could injure the Divine constitution of the Church and seem contrary to her nature. In respect to this, the, Catholic Church, whose power We yield, adhering closely to the precepts of Jesus Christ, her Divine Founder, teaches us to render to God the things which are God's, but to Cesar the things which are Cesar's; and, therefore, while she declares openly that the public power of rulers, in the administration of things human and civil business for the general good, belongs to them in fullest right, she claims to herself free and untrammelled power in those things which pertain to the eternal salvation of souls; but in those matters which are of mixed jurisdiction she holds the best way of arranging the sacred and political power to be that which is attained by friendly league between both parties and by mutual concord. We see it appears how rashly and unjustly they act who hesitate not to cavil at the Church, accusing her of a desire to usurp the rights of others and to detract from the authority of Princes.

"But as far as We are concerned We will never desist from Our purpose, nor cease to strive for the restoration of a durable and stable peace through the removal of causes of dissaffection. May God, Whom most merciful, be moved by the universal prayers to hasten for us the desired desired days, and in the meanwhile may He avert from Germany that plague of unbridled men who endeavoring to fill the world with sedition, terror and ruin.

"In the present great confusion of things and times, let Us not, beloved sons, lose heart. The solemn commemoration of the Ascension of Our Lord, which We this day celebrate, bids Us to be of erect mind. For as Jesus Christ by His death redeemed mankind from captivity to liberty, and gaining victory by His blood, obtained triumph and the glory of a heavenly kingdom, so also they who boast in the Christian name may attain that crown which, they shall have sought by the endurance of labor and toil, and by suffering calamities in this world.

"Relying on this hope, and imitating the example of Jesus Christ, Who, when about to enter the heavens, raised his hand and blessed the Apostles, We also raise Our hands towards the firmament and implore for you firmness of faith, strength and constancy under adversity, and increase in every good work. And, as a pledge of these blessings We, with all love in Christ, bestow the Apostolical Benediction upon you, beloved children, and upon your families, and also upon the Bishops, clergy and faithful of your Churches. Benedico Vos."

The Pope after delivering this speech resumed his seat on the throne, and immediately the students of the German College sang a hymn in Latin. His Holiness then walked through the hall, speaking to the pilgrims, many of whom presented offerings of Peter Pence. The students of the German College and some German students of the Propaganda were then introduced to his Holiness. On retiring from the Sala Ducale the pilgrims at a signal from Prince Lowenstein, raised loud shouts of Viva Leo XIII. and Hoch! The students of the German College and the pilgrims joined in the Te Deum in German when the Pope was departing.

On the 27th Leo XIII. received in special and private audience Marchese Murphy of San Francisco, who presented to his Holy Father a handsome donation to be applied in aid of higher education.

On Sunday, May 29, Sir Charles and Lady Smythe, the Hon. Mrs. Pereira and her daughter admitted to the Pope's private Mass and received Holy Communion from the hands of the Holy Father.

ST. BRIDE'S, MANCHESTER.—Signor Stopponi, an artist of great merit, who recently gained a prize of 3,000 f. ance in competition with Italian artists, has completed for the Bishop of Salford a painting intended for the College of St. Bede, Manchester, representing St. Bede offering to the Blessed Virgin the college. The figures of SS. Peter and Joseph are on either side of Our Lady.

DEPARTURES.—Father Porter, S. J., left Rome on the 27th for Fiesole en route for England. Lady Alexander Lennox has left Rome.

VIRGIL CENTENARY.—The nineteenth centenary of Virgil will occur in the year 1882. The Popes and the Catholic Church have ever been patrons of literature, and the preservation of the choicest remains of classical Latinity is due to the zeal and learning of Catholic ecclesiastics. Leo XIII. is himself one of the first and most accomplished Latinists of the day. The directors of the periodical entitled Civiltà have therefore adopted the idea of connecting the name of the present Pontiff with the commemoration of Virgil—consequently and have offered prizes for the composition of a Latin ode or poem, the subject of which, in Virgilian shall be celebrated the glories of the Pontificate of Leo XIII. Two prizes are offering, one consisting of a gold medal and copies of the best poem printed at the expense of the directors of the Popolo; the other will be a silver medal and copies of the second best poem. Each ode or poem must contain at least 200 hexameters. The prizes are open for competition to all Catholic Latinists of any country. The judges will be six distinguished Latinists chosen from members of the Pontifical Academies, the Arcadia, the Tiberina, and Immaculate Conception, two judges from each of these societies. The judges and the director of the Popolo are excluded from the privilege of competing. The manuscripts must be sent in before the end of this year to Monsignor Luigi Tripepi, director of the Popolo, a motto being attached to each manuscript; and a sealed letter containing the name and address of the author must accompany each poem. It is proposed that the names of the two persons gaining the prizes shall be published in all Catholic journals on the 23rd of March 1882, the anniversary of the Coronation of Leo XIII., and that Catholic men of letters of all nations shall seek an audience of the Holy Father on the Virgilian Centenary, Sept. 22 1882, for the purpose of presenting their works to the supreme Pontiff.

SANTA SABINA.—The Convent of Santa Sabina, taken from the Dominicans under the Suppression Act, has been ceded to the Municipality, and the inmates of the Magistrali Blind Asylum for the Poor in the Piazza di Termini will be removed to Santa Sabina.

A MOCK FUNERAL.—Some days ago a stucco plasterer fell from a scaffolding in one of the many new houses, and died in the hospital of S. Giacomo. The body showed signs of putrefaction, and was ordered to be at once buried. The brother of the deceased was aware of this burial, but was desirous to gratify his own feelings and the feelings of a number of fellow-workmen by marching in procession to the cemetery and giving a sort of public funeral to the deceased. Accordingly the brother went to the municipal authorities and asked for the use of a coffin and municipal hearse to make pretence of a funeral. The authorities granted his request, which, it seems, was not unusual, and also sent a municipal delegate and servants in municipal livery to take part in the solemn farce. The mock funeral, as far as the march to the cemetery was concerned, was carried out with success, and all words have gone well had not some officious friends insisted on carrying the coffin on their shoulders from the halting place outside the cemetery gate to the grave, when the coffin was found light, and was opened and found empty. The indignation of the mourners at the trick thus put on them was intense. They marched back to the hospital and then to the municipality to complain, and to make a demonstration of their wrath at the improper conduct of the officials. These scenes would have been avoided had the brother of the deceased been candid enough to tell his friends that the corpse had been already interred. But the conduct of the municipal authorities in co-operating in such impositions is inexplicable. Perhaps many of these civil funerals are similar shams, encouraged to amuse the revolutionists.

AUCTION AT GIUBBO.—The Marchese Raggiasci Brancaleone, of Giubbo, is dead, and his collection of ancient pictures and works of art will be sold by auction. The Marchese left no will. He was twice married, but had no son. One of his daughters married Count Malchiori, of the Italian Tyrol, and this gentleman was adopted as a son by Marchese Raggiasci, whose name he took and as assigned to be the heir of all the estates and chattels. But as no will was found all the property must be sold and divided among the daughters. The collection of works of art includes some valuable Iustre china of Maestro Giorgio, inlaid tables, and rare specimens of early paintings.

Poetry.

THE ANTI-IRISH IRISHMAN.

I.

From Polar seas to torrid climes,
Where'er the trace of man is found,
What groans or feeling marks our kind,
And sanctifies each spot of ground?
What virtue in the human heart
The proudest tribute can command?
The dearest, purest, holiest, best,
The lasting love of Fatherland.

II.

Then who's the wretch that barely spares
The love of country, kindred, friends—
That barters every nobler aim
For sordid slavery—for private ends?
Our slave alone on earth you'll find
Through Nature's universal span,
So lost to virtue—dead to shame—
The anti-Irish Irishman.

III.

Our fields are fertile, rich our floods,
Our mountains bold, majestic, grand;
Our air is balm, and every breeze
Wings health around our native land.
But who despises all her charms,
And mocks her gifts wherever he can?
Why, he, the Norman's sneaking slave,
The anti-Irish Irishman.

IV.

The Norman—spawn of fraud and guile!
A total sin—a sight our pas-offul shore,
And, leagued with native guilt, despised,
And disliked Erin's fields with gore
Where, in the foeman's footing, here
What wretch unholy led her van?
The prototype of modern slaves,
An anti Irish Irishman!

V.

For ages vaptes ruled our plains,
And slaughter came in their red right hand,
And 'Ireglise shrieks'!—and red-cross bands!
And desolation swept the land!
And who would not those ills arrest,
Or aid the pirate, fling pen or pen,
To burst his country's galling chains?
The anti-Irish Irishman.

VI.

But now too great for fetters grown,
Too proud to bend a slavish knee,
Loved Erin meets the tyrant's thrall,
And finally vows she shall be free!
But mark yon treacherous stealthy knave
That bends beneath his country's ban!
Let infamy eternal brand
That anti Irish Irishman!

Literary Miscellany.

A Legend of the South Wales Coast.

[Dunraven Castle, the seat of the earl of that name, is, as the local reader is aware, situated on the coast of Glamorganshire, a distance of a few miles from Bridgend. The present castle, which came into the family through Miss Windham, the sole heiress of an ancient family, stands on the site of an old building for centuries inhabited by the Vaughans, of the last of whom, Walter Vaughan, the following narrative is preserved in the oral family history.]

A wild and cheerless coast is that of Eastern Glamorganshire; terrible to the mariner, not merely for banks and rocks and perpendicular cliffs, but for—worse—The many old legends and "modern instances" that we have heard, a story of strange catastrophes which has been alluded to by several old topographers, and which invests the headland of Dunraven with a tragical interest.

Walter Vaughan, lord of Dunraven, commenced life under the fairest auspices. Soon after he came to the estate he signalised himself by swimming off with a rope to the crew of a standard ship, whom he saved—a rare act of humanity in those days. The success of this attempt turned his thoughts into a new channel: he busied himself in devising plans for preserving life in cases of shipwreck—he constructed boats, and finally gave his mind to navigation and astronomy. In the lofty watch tower which adjoined his castle, he loved to spend the night in reading the stars. At last he had his plans before the Government, by whom they were slighted and rejected. Treatment like this produced a reaction in a character which, although amiable and enthusiastic, was strongly distinguished by vanity. Walter Vaughan returned home an altered man. The deserted halls of Dunraven once more resounded with revelry; the watch tower was deserted; the bowl and then the dice engrossed its owner. He was pronounced on all hands to have revived the hospitalities of the old Welsh chieftains, and gained what he coveted—distinction. In the meantime he had married. It is uncertain whether he broke the heart of his wife or not, but she died at last, and his fortune began to fail, leaving four boys, the eldest of whom was on the verge of manhood, and the youngest exhibit of four years old. Man is the same everywhere; the Welsh gentry turned their backs on their prodigal friend when poverty stuck him. The castle was nearly shut up, and its lord, with one attendant, a faithful harper, again betook himself to the watch-tower. His eldest son, no longer heir, for there was hardly any inheritance left, determined to seek fortune on the broad ocean, and in foreign parts. The parting was painful; the affections of the father, long deadened by dissipation, returned in the hour of desolation with redoubled force to their natural channel—he had loving children left, although he had lost wealth, friends, and reputation; anxiety and remorse made him prematurely old. Who could recognise in that stooping form and haggard countenance the manly youth of five and twenty years ago? A wreck occurred about this time, which bettered the condition of Vaughan, who, as Lord of the Manor, possessed under charters that had descended from Saxon times a right to property "cast up by the sea," although the rights of owners remained in for 366 days, if anything living, except vermin of courses, should be found on board—a law which was practically a dead letter. This event gave birth to a new passion in the mind of the broken landlord. Could not sufficient property be accumulated by wrecking to reclaim the estate for the eldest son? There lived in the neighborhood a man of desperate habits, nicknamed "Mat of the Iron Hand," who had once been the captain of a piratical vessel, which, when in port was seized by order of Mr. Vaughan, a magistrate, soon after he came to his estate. There was, however, a desperate struggle with the crew, and the captain, who lost his hand in the fight, turned wrecker and erected a stone in his bosom against the man who had ruined him. Strange to say, Mr. Vaughan, notwithstanding the protestations of his faithful dependant, the old harper, formed an alliance with this ruffian, who had gained notoriety by hanging out false lights to mislead vessels. They were never seen together in the daytime, but those who were abroad in the dark averred that they had observed the confederates in company. The Lord of Dunraven and his harper now spent much of their time in a sea beaten grotto—a wild place which commanded a boundless view to the south westward. One day as the sun was descending gloomily towards the horizon, the watchers saw the ill-omened form of Mat of the Iron Hand near them. He was looking steadily towards a rock called "The Swinkets," which was dry at dead low water, but covered with the tides a half-flood. A gleam of exultation shot athwart the wrecker's face. There was a sharp cry! What boat is that drifting out to seaward? The fatal truth flashed on the mind of Mr. Vaughan. His two boys were on the rock—their boat had drifted away under the influence of a raging spring tide. The distracted father rushed to the beach—his sons saw his agony, but his voice was lost amidst the roar of the sea and the hoarse sighing of the wind—

"Twas vain the loud waves lashed the shore,
Return or aid prevention;
The waters wild went o'er his child,
And he was left lamenting."

Both the young Vaughans were drowned. This was not all. The old man rushed home to seek the youngest—he had one left. "In the confusion," says an old topographer, "the youngest child, left alone, fell into a vessel of beer, and is smothered at the same time. The bereaved parent was stunned by a blow so fearful and so sudden; and the people of the neighborhood spoke of it as a just retribution; many declaring that gain gotten by those who followed wrecking as a trade—who lured men to destruction by false lights and other evil practices—never came to any good. After this event Mr. Vaughan wished to amend his life and endeavored to shake off his associate, the pirate, fling pen or pen, his eldest son, of whom he had heard nothing since his departure from home. One evening, the old man observed a distant vessel standing slowly up the channel, the movement of which seemed characterised by uncertainty, as if the master hardly knew what course to take. She was soon hidden by the gloom of the night, which became gusty. Mr. Vaughan felt anxious about this vessel, for it is believed that sorrow had worked repentance; and he went down to his cave by the shore, accompanied by the harper. The latter, dreading evil from Mat of the Iron Hand, whose hatred to his master had broken out unequivocally of late, took arms. They had not been long near the sea, before the ruffian's false lights cast a lurid gleam over the rocks. The night grew thick and drizzling; but the old man moodily refused to stir. Presently crashing sounds were heard above the howling of the wind; wild and broken cries followed, and in half an hour Mat the pirate entered the cave. A few words hurriedly passed; the wrecker declared that the ship's boat had been swamped by the waves, and that every living thing in it had been drowned. The captain, he said, remained alone on the wreck, which drove on the rocks after the crew had deserted her; he stated that he was a Welshman, and that his birthplace was of this coast. "Did you help him, villain?" interrupted Mr. Vaughan. The wrecker distorted answer, but with a cordial laugh, thrust a cold hand into that of the questioner. Mr. Vaughan started at its clay-like coldness. A gleam of suspicion crossed his countenance—he was that of the corpse of the heir of Dunraven, who he had murdered on the wreck. The broken-hearted father soon after left the district. Some say that the pirate was shot by the harper, others that he was executed a few months after for another murder committed on a shipwrecked seaman. The tradition of "The Mountain Decameron" has given rise to this legend into a moralizing tale, which will be found in the Cambrian Quarterly Magazine, a periodical of limited circulation, which was discontinued many years ago.

A Roman Villa Excavated in England.

Expectation that the discovery of Roman remains at Morton, near Brading, in the Isle of Wright, would lead to the complete unearthing of a villa, perhaps the most important of its kind in Britain, is now fully assured. Within the past few weeks five more chambers have been laid open, and the number of separate rooms is now nearly thirty. The excavations, which were resumed, as soon as the spring weather had fairly set in, by Mr. John E. Price, F.S.A., and Mr. F. G. Hilton Price, F.G.S., have been constantly attended by success; and while fresh discoveries are being made almost daily, it is gratifying to find that the pains and care which have been taken by the association antiquarian to preserve the tessellated pavements, first uncovered, through the winter, were not in vain. Down to Saturday afternoon Mr. Hilton Price was still prosecuting the work, which, at every step, indicates the vast extent of the building yet to be excavated. The room scanned by the hypocaust has now been fully developed, and with it the first portion of an external wall; though even yet no definite report can be given of the general plan of the building itself. Many objects illustrating its structural character have been found, the most important of these being plainly indicative of a long open court, supported on colums; and when this shall have been cleared, evidence will be afforded of a Roman edifice more stately and palatial than any of the ordinary domestic structures left by the Italian invaders after their long occupation of Britain. This court, indeed, is the most significant of all discoveries yet made on Morton farm. The excavation of the well is to be continued, the depth already reached being rather more than 65 feet, and the descent having been made, a day or two since, by a young lady, daughter of Mr. Hilton Price, who, at her own request, was lowered in a bucket. Pottery and bones still continue to be brought to the surface, and additional coins have recently been found, mostly of date corresponding with those previously recorded. Traces of chambers such as those in course of excavation appear in the adjoining fields belonging to Mrs. Munns, who has consented that explorations may here be made; and it is expected that the whole series of buildings, divided as they yet are by the limits of different properties, will eventually be open, anc accessible to the public.

WEDDED IN SILENCE.

An Interesting Scene in the Church of St. Peter and St. Paul, Brooklyn.

William G. Pownal and Miss Lizzie Wall, both of them deaf mutes, were married in the Church of St. Peter and St. Paul in Second Street, Brooklyn, a few days ago. The groom is a member of the firm of Harvey A. Pownall, art stained glass works 469 Hudson avenue, Brooklyn. He is well-to-do, a man of education, and not more than twenty-eight years old. Soon after his arrival in this country, from London a year or two ago he became a teacher of a class of deaf mutes in St. Francis Xavier's Sunday school in this city. One of his pupils was Miss Wells with whom he thus first became acquainted. She was able to hear and speak until she was five years old. She then had a fall which destroyed her hearing; and upon this misortune followed loss of speech. Her parents subsequently sent her to be educated in a Buffalo deaf mute institution. Last May she removed from New York to Brooklyn, and became a member of Father Malone's church of St. Peter and St. Paul.

About one hundred and fifty ladies and a sprinkling of gentlemen had gathered in the church yesterday when a carriage-crowe up containing the bridal couple. Miss Agnes Lynch, the bridesmaid, and Thomas F. Brady, the groom's best man. The last two are not deaf mutes. They walked before the bride and groom up the aisle, to the music of the Wedding March. In front of the chancel the leading couple divided and the bride and groom took places between them. The bride was dressed in a travelling costume of ceru silk trimmed with amber. Eeru feathers swept over her hat, which was also trimmed with silk and satin of the same color. She wore diamonds. She has a fair complexion and dark brown hair.

The Rev. M. P. Costin, S.J., of St. John's College, Fordham, assisted by the Rev. Father Gallagher of the Church of St. Peter and St. Paul, performed the ceremony. He has taken much interest in deaf mutes, and has incidently acquired a knowledge of the sign language. Not a word was spoken during the ceremony until Father Costin said the Latin prayers in closing. It is supposed to be the first wedding of deaf mutes solemnized in the sign language by a clergyman, in the diocese.

When Father Costin spelled out with his fingers the words, "Will you take Lizzie Wells, here present, for thy lawful wife according to the rites of our holy mother, the Church?" Mr. Pownall shot the first three fingers of his right hand and extended it before him with the thumb and little fingers which in his case took the place of the virtual words. "I will." Then the same question was put to the bride, who gracefully replied in the same way, and at the same time bowed her head in assent.

Next, Father Costin began to signify the words, "I, William S. Pownall, take thee, Lizzie Wells, for my lawful wife, to have and to hold from this day forward; for better, for worse, for richer, for poorer, in sickness and in health, till death do us part." He expected that the groom would repeat them after him clause by clause, but the groom, who evidently knew the passage by heart and who is very dexterous in the use of the sign language, took the words out of Father Costin's mouth, if the expression may be allowed, and completed the declaration. The priest soon stopped making signs with his fingers, and contented himself with bowing assent to show that he understood the words spelled out to he according to the ritual. When it came to the bride's turn to make the corresponding declaration, she also rattled it off ahead of the priest with similar fluency.

Father Costin said in silence: "I unite you in matrimony in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost." The ring having been blessed and sprinkled with holy water, he took from one, the groom received it, and, holding it in his left hand, said with his right: "With this ring I thee wed, and I plight unto thee my troth." Then with his right hand he put the ring on the bride's finger.

After the ceremony the bridal party was driven to the bride's home, 166 South Second street. Last evening the bride and groom, accompanied by the bride's sister, who can speak, started on a tour to Saratoga. Among the many handsome presents displayed at the bride's residence were a large and very valuable diamond cross and a gold-lined silver service of twelve pieces.

Why God Allows Persecutions.

Bishop O'Reilly, of Springfield, in promulgating the Jubilee in his diocese, says: "In the midst of all the trials and afflictions that harass the Church of Jesus Christ, the faithful have the consolation of reflecting on the promises of our divine Founder, that he would never abandon her: 'Behold, says he, 'I am with you all days, even to the consummation of the world.' (Math. c. xxviii, v. 20.) This cheering promise, and the consciousness that no matter how triumphant her enemies may appear for a time, in the end she will be victorious, for 'the gates of hell shall not prevail against her,' (Matt. c. xvi. v. 18.) have sustained the courage of the visible head and members of the Church in the midst of the most trying persecutions. God permits these persecutions for wise reasons known to Himself; and He who could humiliate His enemies by a single fiat of His will, allows them apparently to triumph, that he may kindle in the hearts of his followers sentiments of humility, that thus impressed with the idea of their absolute dependence on Him, they may have recourse to Him with prayer and penitential works. The Church of Christ suffers much in many places at the present time, and is no place more than in the 'Holy City,' the centre of unity. Hence our Holy Father, Pope Leo XIII., has proclaimed an extraordinary Jubilee to the whole world. . . . Though there is necessarily connection between the different acts of the Jubilee, properly acquirous that they have as close a connection as possible. Hence we must earnestly desire that in the different parishes the edifying spectacle will be seen of all performing the Jubilee at the same time, for this will also afford another most desirable advantage to the faithful, of having strange priests to hear their confessions—an advantage which should be frequently given by all having the care of souls.

The Hierarchy of the Church.

Thirty three Popes have sealed their testimony with their blood, consecrating the See in which now rules Leo, thirteenth of his name and two hundred and sixty third of his line. The Pope is Bishop of Rome, Vicar of Jesus Christ, successor of the Prince of the Apostles, Sovereign Pontiff of the Universal Church, Patriarch of the West, Primate of Italy, Archbishop and Metropolitan of the Roman Province, and Sovereign of the temporal domain of the Roman Church. His collaterals and coadjutors are the cardinals. Of these, six are of the order of bishops, occupying the suburban sees, fifty are of the order of priests, and eleven diaconal titles, making the actual number of cardinals sixty-three, of whom one was created by Gregory XVI., forty-eight by Pius IX., and fourteen by Leo XIII. Three cardinals have been created at the last consistory, but being reserved in petto, are still unnamed and unknown. There are in addition four hats vacant. Four of the cardinals are older than eighty years, twenty-nine are more than seventy, fifteen than sixty, twelve than fifty. There are only three cardinals younger than fifty. Fifteen cardinals have died since the pontificate of Leo opened. Next to the cardinalate is the patriarchate, there are six patriarchs of the Latin, and six of the Oriental rite. There are 1,135 hierarchicalites, of which, 1,003 are diocesan, 46 Vicars-Cardinal-Bishops, 6 Cardinal-Priests, 46 Cardina' Deacons, 11 Titular and Diaconal Churches held in commendam, 12 Patriarchs of the two Rites, 11 Archbishops of the Latin Rite, 137 Bishops of the Latin Rite, 601 Archbishops and Bishops of the Oriental Rite, 52 Vallesa Dioceses, 14 Dioceses held in administration, 13 Apostolic Delegates, 6 Vicars Apostolic, 26 Prefects Apostolic, 102 Vicariates and Prefectures in administration, 6 Of the bishops and archbishops 290 have sees in partibus. There are ninety-nine sees directly subject to the Holy See. The Church continues to progress, as in the days of Pope Pius IX. . . . Mgr. Ledochowski, Prefect of Propaganda, and three prefectures.

Brazil Spreading the Faith.

Senor Ruarique de Macedo, Minister of Public Works, has addressed the following despatch to the Brazilian representative at Rome "The Imperial Government, desiring to give a greater extention to the work of instructing and civilizing the Indians, and feeling assured that the order of Ursuline is the most valuable auxiliary in the work, recommend to your Excellency to employ every effort to secure the prompt arrival in Brazil of as great a number of the religious of this order as possible. The necessary resources for the object in view, will without delay be placed at the disposal of your legation. This, while infidel France is tyrannically expelling the religious orders, it is gratifying to learn that a government which, like Brazil, was so long under the baleful influence of Free Masonry, is turning to better ways, and is now eager to secure the services of those devoted sons, who by their heroic ardor, and self-denying zeal, are alone fitted to carry out successfully this important work. A great reaction is manifesting itself in the Empire by the remarkable fervor for the persecutions of recent years. The Imperial Family have income province alone of Nia-at-Grosse, has recently confirmed 10,000 persons, and has received the abjurations of great numbers of Free Masons.

Important to Bread-Eaters.

The Court Journal states that the letter to which the following article, from the Huddersfield Journal, refers, caused every bakery in London to be besieged "Wellest week published a letter, from 'Chemist, on the advisability of the more general consumption of 'wheat-meal bread. The question is one of great importance, and demands serious consideration. Wheat-meal bread is made from corn which has been deprived of only the outer husk, and, that is to say, the flour contains the bran. The bread thus produced is not only much cheaper than the ordinary white bread, but it is much better. A shilling's worth contains three times more flesh giving material, and three times more bone-forming material than is to be found in a shilling's worth of beefsteak. For the discoveries in this respect we are indebted to the late Baron Liebig, who has done more than anybody else to show the world the secret of economical and wholesome cooking. Of course it is not proposed that the highly-nutritious wheat meal bread should be man's only food. It is, however, true, the peasant lives and flourish a on wheat-meal bread and garlic, but the British working man would be very loth to go without the roast beef of old England. There can be no reason, however, why wheat meal bread should not be substituted for ordinary white bread. Its nutritive qualities more would need less quantities of other vituals, and thus an appreciative saying of money would be the result, while (in growing children especially) the bones, sinews and muscles would be strengthened, and thick coats of pure enamel would preserve the teeth from decay. The only obstacle to the way of the adoption of wheat meal is prejudice.

John H. Griscom's Fast.

Cincinnati, June 26. John H. Griscom completed four weeks of his fast at noon yesterday. Although he walked twelve miles on Thursday and Friday, he has since that time remained closely in his room. This was not because he had experienced any uncomfortable effects from his pedestrianism, but because he was busy thinking, as he said. During these communings he walked restlessly up and down his apartments, and an estimate placed the distance at four miles. Griscom does not say anything about it, but he is evidently worried and disappointed at the small receipts at the doors. What with rent and kindred other outlays, his expenses are quite heavy, and are far more than one quarter defrayed by the receipts. About two weeks ago he foolishly placed himself in charge of a penny newspaper here, and has devoted a great deal of time since then in writing for its columns a tiresome narrative of his goings and comings, drinking and sleeping and talk and chatter with visitors. The public has taken little interest in him since that time, and if the fast turns out a financial failure it will be due to his very palpable attempt to make a show of himself at a time when the city was overrun with circuses of much larger dimensions.

Up to Thursday last Griscom scrupulously refused even to boil his water, in order to economize the store of tissue, but his experience of the week just closed has demonstrated the fact that exercise is not attended with corresponding decrease of weight. During the last week the faster's avoirdupois has fallen off only 3½ pounds, and his weight yesterday was precisely the same as the day before. Four weeks having been completed at noon yesterday, he kicked the beam at 164½ pounds, 3¾ pounds less than when the fast began. The measurements of the different parts of the body were identical with those of a week ago. The faster is now drinking forty-eight ounces of water a day. The doctors continued their microscopical examination of the blood last night, but they would not venture to account for the gradual diminution of the corpuscles.

For a man who has gone twenty-nine days without food, Griscom is a very bright, cheerful, gay-looking person. His newspaper organ endeavored yesterday to create the impression that he was on the eve of a collapse, mental as well as physical. He was described as extremely nervous, emaciated, and melancholy, and the opinion was ventured that he would be compelled to break his fast or lose his reason.

The Sun correspondent found Griscom this evening sitting at a table conversing with a few consumptive-looking watchers and appearing for all the world like a man who had just risen from a hearty meal of roast beef and plum pudding. He has a large face and body and one would need to see his hands to be the victim of the fasting mania. His ruddy cheeks were cleanly shaven, and the color in his face and neck was as much like that of a healthy person. He was conversing in a low tone, and seemed to be as comfortable as any one in the room. If he had actually gone four weeks without food of any kind—and there is no evidence at present to the contrary—there is no reason apparent why he should not continue the fast for a month or two longer. He says, however, that he will stop as soon as he feels that his abstinence begins to affect him injuriously.

PROFITABLE MIMICRY.

Amusing Story of King Ludewig and Herr Lang.

There is an agent active in Munich, Lang by name, of whom a funny story is told. King Ludewig I., father of the present King, was a great patron of art, and was on very familiar terms with most of the worthy and notable artists and actors. Among other intimates he was accustomed to frequent was a lever whose most of the notabilities of the day congregated to drink beer and smoke the friendly cigar. On one occasion he unkenly made his appearance in the midst of a group of actors, and stepping up behind Franz Seraph, put his hands over her eyes and held them tightly there. Frau Siegel guessed at once that it must be Lang, who was fond of practical jokes, and exclaimed "Oh, I know you, Herr Lang, you are always teasing me or mimicking the King." "Oh, I," exclaimed Ludwig, discovering himself, to the extreme dismay of the actress, "as Herr Lang mimes the King, does he?" We will see how well he can do it. Come, Herr Lang, give me an exhibition of your powers in that direction."

The poor actor, half frightened out of his wits, declared that there must be some mistake; that he never, in any possible circumstances, could do so unwarrantable a thing as to mimic his Majesty, and, pale with fright, begged to be excused. The King was miserable, however, and said, "Let there be no delay, sir. I command you to begin!" Herr Lang, seeing that he was in a fearful fix, assumed the attitude of the King, and in a loud voice, "Up the way, Secretary Schmidt, I should like to have you speak a few lines of Iambics of my lost sime down to the Actors Club to-morrow; and while you are about it, you may drop in at the Court Theatre and order dred guilders and send them to Herr Lang, a very worthy and comical fellow." At this point Ludwig stepped him with, "There there, Herr Lang, you have mimicked quite enough to suit my fancy, and what you have said has been well said and to the point." The next day the wine was delivered to the club and the guilders to Lang, but the King never again asked him to give an exhibition of his powers of mimicry.

A young man asked a sailor "Can you tell me why no hotel-keeper would like to board a ship?" Because its hold is too great," was the reply.

GRAPHIC PEN PICTURE OF HOME RULE M. P.S.

Kelly, Sexton, O'Connor and Redmond, Justin McCarthy and Joseph Cowan.

How Kelly Wanted to Fight Tottenham Gratitude Due to the English M. P. Mr. Cowan.

LONDON, June 8.

"School broke up for the Whitsuntide holidays" last Friday, Head Master Gladstone leaving Member Tottenham to call the roll. Master J. J. O'Kelly got "an early day, sir"—in fact, got holidays twelve hours before the rest of the class—for proficiency in English literature.

I salute thee, "O, J. O!" May your shadow never be less; and may your sound heart and jaillant pluck be always equal to the task of making "liars and calumniators" back small and mean!

Mr. O'Kelly had heard the story current in the lobbies that Lord Randolph Churchill, to whom Lord Harrington used the very same expressions barely a few days before, had sent a friend, or else forwarded a polite note, to the noble marquis, asking for an explanation of his language. The Indian Secretary, whose company no one denies, explained that the words "false and calumnious" were applied, not to Lord Randolph, himself, but to the statements which he had repeated in the House on the authority of Vanity Fair. Upon this Lord Randolph expressed himself satisfied".

Mr. O'Kelly marvelled much whether the accidental member for Leitrim, being a man of bigger frame, would be found a man of poorer metal than the noble lord of Wood-stock. Would he seek explanation of such words were similarly used of him? Mr. O'Kelly determined to test this matter. He would afford Colonel Tottenham the opportunity of making such an inquiry, and those who know Mr. O'Kelly may guess the answer that would await the gallant colonel.

Now, the way the affair fell out was this Colonel Tottenham, in defiance of the well known rules of Parliament, and in utter violation of fair play and decency was endeavoring, in an irregular manner, under cover of a pretended "question, to fasten on certain Irish members then present in the House but who, he well knew, could not then be allowed to reply to him, the infamous imputation of being accomplices in murder. He had been checked by Mr. T. P. O'Connor, and gently reproved by the Speaker, but still he would persevere. In the presence of more than one member of the Land League executive he would insist on hurling the charge that that body had instigated or was accountable for the recent murders in Ireland. He determined to use Lord Hartington's words, curious to see if Colonel Tottenham would, like Lord Randolph Churchill, of course. Had the Colonel done so, there are others besides myself on this side of the Havannah who would anger a dollar or more that Mr. Speaker would be issuing his writ for a vacancy, and a bulky vacancy too, in Leitrim county before the 1st of July.

Fortunately Colonel Tottenham is a man of peace and of prudence. It would have been painful to everybody if any accident befel him in Belgium or France. Hatred is valuable; his figure is manque; and it would be pitiable to see such a splendid man hobbling about on a wooden leg, or permanently laid beneath the daisies because of a rash attempt to libel Land Leaguers like Mr. J. J. O'Kelly.

But, you may ask, why was Mr. O'Kelly "manuel," seeing that Lord Hartington was not? Bless your innocent soul, the time is long since gone by when considerations of this sort determine the usage meted out to Irish members. Lord Hartington is Lord Hartington. Mr. O'Kelly is only an Irish gentleman, a Home Ruler, and a Land Leaguer. I cannot, nevertheless, help thinking that even a few seconds' reflection would have enabled the Speaker to see the very different position of the two, plunging—the utter unmoistening of "naming" an Irish member for language again and again allowed to Englishmen. But I fear the Mr. Brand that used to be Speaker has never come back since he disappeared, one day last February, during the exciting struggle. "I name you, Mr. O'Kelly," cried the present old gentleman, and everyone felt he had put his foot in it "Ayes to the right, noes to the left." It was all over before any one could realize the fact. "Mr. O'Kelly will now withdraw." Hurriedly whispering to a colleague that he might want him should Colonel Tottenham have any communication to make in the evening, our Cuban friend walked down the center of the floor with head erect and sparkling eyes as if he were going "up" for the Cross of the Legion of Honor.

Then came the turn of the Speaker to feel uncomfortable. Up rose Justin McCarthy, that man of dreadful memory and unaccommodating honesty. He reminded the House that a previous Speaker, in the case of Lord Palmerston, had decided that the words "false and calumnious" were not unparliamentary when applied to statements. This was awkward. Every one looked as if a good hearty cheer would relieve his soul. But "our shoes, our boots!" the thing was done, and it must be backed up now. "That question is not now before the chair." Of course it wasn't. "The clerk will now proceed to read the orders of the day."

There are three men amongst the young recruits of the Irish party who under fairer chances and happier circumstances might surely be trusted to become the future orators of the national cause in Parliament T. Sexton, J. E. Redmond, and T. P. O'Connor. But as I watch them night after night spendthrift themselves cheerfully in the toilsome duties that array against them the prejudices of the House—the member for Galway especially—never thinking, never sinning, though the fighting ambitions of youth and its thirst of fame must be strong within them. I confess my heart warms for those young men.

You cannot pass through the lobby of the House, you cannot spend five minutes in the hall of the Reform Club, without hearing from English members the sorrowful wail over the way Mr. Justin McCarthy has "thrown himself away" on the Irish cause. They never will forgive him, and one or two others whom they freely name, favorites as they are. That "work men" should back up Parnell and the Land League!" indeed the Premier seems to be quite furious with the member for Longford, and comes down upon him in the House with special and ostentatious bitterness of language.

The event of Friday night was a speech from Mr. Joseph Cowan in support of the Irish motion which I would have traveled from Dublin to hear. It is many a long year since I felt myself so stirred by words of man. It was the very genius of eloquence. It was the poetry of thought, the language of the heart. I would say this was, if I could, the speech of his great efforts—one of his most brilliant achievements in the House of Commons. Not since Bright's days have I seen such well-sustained attempt to make a show of himself at a time when the city was overrun with circuses of much larger dimensions.

Up to Thursday last Griscom scrupulously refused even to boil his water, in order to economize the store of tissue, but his experience of the week just closed has demonstrated the fact that exercise is not attended with corresponding decrease of weight. During the last week the faster's avoirdupois has fallen off only 3½ pounds, and his weight yesterday was precisely the same as the day before. WRIT-SERVING IN CLARE.

Collision Between the Police and the People.

The correspondent of the Cork Examiner, writing from Limerick, gives the following description of the service of the writs on Colonel O'Callaghan's property at Redpike on Friday.

The scenes enacted yesterday at Redpike were certainly the most extraordinary and the most unique that have had to be recorded since the commencement of the present agitation. It was not merely violence of the ordinary kind that was resorted to. Warfare—petty warfare it may be—of the guerilla type is exactly the term to apply to the episode of yesterday. There was an actual resort to arms on the part, at least, of a portion of the people, and military tactics had to be adopted by the police of no less complete and decisive a character than those which are employed by regular troops when engaged with the enemy on the battlefield. Writs had been obtained by Colonel O'Callaghan within the past few days against twenty-six of the tenants who reside in the neighborhood of Redpike, the arrangements on an elaborate scale were made for their service. One hundred and fifty police under County Inspector Smyth and a sub-inspector left Ennis yesterday morning, and accompanied Colonel O'Callaghan and Executive Halliwell, the process server, to Redpike. Mr. O'Hara, R. M., was in charge of the expedition. On its arrival at the village about ten o'clock a large crowd assembled, shouted, and yelled in a terrific manner. A strong feeling seemed to be manifested by the people towards the resident magistrate, and he was persistently hissed and groaned. The excitement waxed high, and [illegible] mounted constables to charge the crowd. The instructions of the magistrate were quickly obeyed, and the people flew in all directions. However, quickly rallied and flourished their sticks in defiance. In the midst of the charge a horse was coming close upon a farmer's son named Patrick Purcell, who struck the animal with a stick on the head so as to avoid a collision. Mr. O'Hara directed to have Purcell arrested, and he was affected by half a dozen policemen. The prisoner shouted to his friends to rescue him, and a farmer named John Molony rushed to his relief, when a sub-constable ran at him deliberately, levelled the butt end of his rifle, and with a most violent blow broke in his skull. Another version is that during the attempt to rescue Purcell the police were again ordered to charge the crowd, and that in doing so the sub-constable came upon Molony, on whom he inflicted the fatal injuries already described. The fact, however, is that the man was killed by the blow which he received. His consciousness returned to him after a short time, but he became insensible again, and, although Dr. Dunworth was in constant attendance, he expired at nine o'clock last evening. The name of the policeman who inflicted the blow is not yet known, except to the constabulary authorities, but he is a young man, and not apparently long in the force. Molony was a man of 50 years of age, and is the father of nine children, and he resided at Cahertierley, about a mile and a half distance from the village. When the scenes at Redyke had terminated, the whole party marched down the road and halted opposite the farm of Edmond Malone, the first of the tenants who were to be served with writs. The people then assembled in a field to the left of the passage through which the police were to approach Malone's house, and for a half hour or more perfect quiet prevailed. At twelve o'clock the police moved into the field, and were proceeding slowly when three shots were fired from behind a fence which runs at the rear of Malone's house. The point from which these shots were fired is on the top of a hill which commanded the valley, at the foot of which police were marching. When the shots were fired perfect consternation seemed to seize the expeditionary party. Colonel O'Callaghan is reported to have said, "We are all shot"—an observation indicating an apprehension that a mass of people lay behind the fence at the top of the hill. Three shots more were fired, and Mr. O'Hara gave the order to fall down or retreat. Several of the police ran out on the road and sheltered themselves behind hedges; while others lay flat on the ground. After a few minutes, the fire from the hill not being continued, the police re-formed, but were directed to scatter themselves and surround the hill. They advanced cautiously, firing as they went along, but when they had got half way up the hill three women appeared on the top of the fence, and, although the police levelled their rifles at them, they refused to move. They are stated to have expressed their determination not to stir one inch, and defied the police. The object of the movement on their part was, it is supposed, to enable the men who had been engaged in firing to escape. When the hill had been gained the enemy was nowhere to be seen. The police, however, kept on firing, and, it is alleged, at a number of people who were doing nothing. One man stated that a bullet grazed his ear, and passed through the hat of a person named Daniel Day, who was standing before him. Of the people who were standing in the field, and acting apparently the part of spectators, some twenty were arrested. They were handcuffed, one to the other, and their suspenders were removed, so that they should hold up their trousers with the hand which was not tied. Mr. O'Hara then read the Riot Act, and threatened that any three men who were seen standing together would be fired upon. This had the effect of including the people in partially dispersed, and they, on hearing the writs were proceeded with. Twenty of the writs were served, but there was no time to complete the service of the whole number.

The departure of the police from Redpike was characterised by incidents more tragic than those which had previously occurred. The main body of the force which accompanied Colonel O'Callaghan and the processes left the village on long cars for Ennis, but they had not proceeded far when a regular fusilade was opened upon them from either side of the road. The country, being rugged and craggy, afforded complete shelter to the attacking party, who lay behind large boulders, and were thus completely hid from view until they appeared suddenly in sight. The foremost horse was shot dead. The police jumped off the cars, from behind which they returned the fire, Mr. O'Hara, having to turn to Feakle, left Redpike about the same time that the main force departed for Ennis. He was escorted by seven policemen. When he was approaching Rossbridge five men appeared in a bog in full view and fired at the party. The police fired in return, but, as alleged, they had to beat a retreat and seek safety under the arch of the bridge, where they remained until their assailants had disappeared.

The funeral of the body of John Molonoy who was killed in the affray, was opened on Friday week before Mr. Frost county coroner, and a jury of eighteen. The inquest was held in an outhouse attached to the dwelling of the deceased, situated on the top of a mountain, about three miles distant from Redyke. After hearing the evidence of the doctors as to the cause of death, the inquest adjourned.

Reduced Rents in England.

While the public attention is so keenly excited about the condition of Ireland, it has almost escaped notice that in England matter have become the rule in some of the districts which used to be the most flourishing in the country. In Essex, Hants, Hertford, Bedfordshire, and numerous other counties and shires, the rents of numberless farms have been reduced by 20, 30, and even 50 and 70 per cent. In numerous cases even these reductions have been insufficient to induce the tenant to retain or resume possession, and the instances are not few in which valuable farms have been left in possession of the cultivators with no other obligation than to keep the farm in condition, and to pay the rates and taxes. The signs of the times seem to portend a long continuation of the crisis which is breaking down the British agricultural system, and it is to be hoped that before an improvement takes place the ownership of land will be rather a burden than an advantage, and an immense amount of capital will be driven from its present channels. The landowner is very often worse off than the farmer. The former can withdraw his capital from the land, but what is to be done with the land which is thus left on the hands of the owner.

Who Attend Ingersoll's Lectures.

Some weeks ago, a Mr. Ingersoll, from one of the Western States, delivered a number of lectures in various cities, repeating the old objections of infidels against Christianity. There was nothing very novel in what he said, nevertheless he succeeded in attracting large numbers to hear him. It greatly puzzled the ministers of the sects why their churches should be empty and the theatre crowded. Now they are beginning to ask who are the people who form his audience. One writer says: "They are people who, like himself, are familiar with the Scriptures and with allusions to sacred themes. But are they Catholics? A writer in the Chicago Times says: "It was nearly possible to ascertain the Church character of the lecturer against the various denominations were received. When the attacks were made on the Roman Catholic faith, the applause was general and even vociferous, but when directed against Presbyterianism, which the lecturer designated as the meanest of all religions, the applause was comparatively light.

THE MONITOR.

TWENTY FOURTH YEAR OF PUBLICATION.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

THURSDAY ..... JULY 7.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

During the next two weeks Mr. S. J. McCormick will visit the following and other places in Sierra, Nevada and Yuba counties, in the interest of the Monitor, viz: Truckee, Sierra City, Downieville, Marysville, Laporte, St. Louis, Howland Flat, Whiskey Diggings, Forest City, Camptonville, Cherokee, Moore's Flat, French Corral, San Juan, Bloomington, Smartsville and Timbuctoo. Mr. McCormick hopes that all persons who know themselves indebted to the Monitor will be prepared to settle their accounts when he calls, and he asks the aid of the Rev. clergy and friends of the paper, in every place he may visit to help him in propagating the cross that defends the Faith and the Church it represents.

Sunday Picnics.

From April to September is the season for Sunday picnics in San Francisco. Nearly all the Irish benevolent societies, military companies, and other organizations, have annual Sunday excursions during this time. They make money by them. In San Francisco, however the treasury of a society needs replenishing, the usual remedy is, "let us get up a picnic," and invariably that picnic is held on Sunday. Now, although we do not entertain any pharisaical notions about the proper observance of the Lord's Day, we must protest against the Sunday picnics. It is, of course, lawful and proper for men and women who work hard during the week, to take healthful recreation on Sunday, to go upon an excursion into the country, or to enjoy themselves in any innocent manner at home or abroad. It is the abuse of this lawful privilege that we complain of. Sunday picnics, as many, if not most of them, are conducted, are a disgrace and a reproach to the Irish Catholics of this city.

Sunday after Sunday, the obligation of hearing Mass is dispensed with, or only a portion heard, or assisted at without proper attention or respect by professed Catholics, who are more anxious to be in time for the boat or train which takes them to the picnic grounds than to obey the Third Commandment of God. All other religious exercises recommended for the due observance of the Lord's Day are of course utterly ignored and forgotten. The entire day is misspent in dancing, drinking, sports and games. Often the day winds up by the commission of heinous crime. Thousands of promising young men and women of this city, who belonged to some of our holy sodalities and other pious organizations, have fallen to rise no more, since they

Farm and Home.

Give the Children a Pet.

Every mother desires to see her children grow up loving, patient, forbearing, gentle, and care-taking for others. They may give them the wisest precepts day by day all of their lives, and yet fail to reach their desire if they hope to gain it by precept alone. It is hard to lead them to practice these virtues, much harder than to tell them to do so. Children love dependent creatures, and through this love, which seems a wise provision, these qualities can best be trained. It is true that a bird, a cat, or dog, or squirrel may be the source of much trouble and vexation, and so the mother positively says "no" when the little child begs so to keep it. Just here a mistake is made. Stop and consider the pleasure the child will have in its pet property, and that there is no better way in which the practical exercise of the kindlier nature can be provided for. Children will undergo all kinds of self-denial in order to keep a pet dog, cat or bird, do everything for them with their own little hands in order that that mother may not be annoyed by them. This very act makes their hearts gentle, and their touch tender, and, indeed, softens their whole nature.

Looking at it from other standpoints it is beneficial. Responsibilities come to all some time in life, and if they come suddenly when mature years have been reached, and the natures have become unbending, then they weigh with redoubled power. So let the feeling of having responsibilities come to children by allowing them to have pets, and have them take the entire care of them, and it is very seldom indeed that they will ever neglect them; oftentimes giving up an apple or a cake for them, or some game to tend to their wants. Let the boys on the farm own a calf, a lamb, or pig, the girls some fowls or a lamb, and see how easy it is to get them up in the morning by simply reminding them that their pets and property need to be fed.

—Cabbage is best given to poultry whole, hung up by the stalk. At first it may not be touched, but when one fowl begins to peck at it the rest will be tempted to keep on until little remains. Being suspended, it does not waste or become polluted, and it will remain in good condition to be eaten at will.

—The most substantial walks and carriage roads are first excavated to the depth of a foot or more, then small or broken stone placed at the bottom, smaller ones on these, then gravel and tar mixed, coarse sand and tar on this, and usually an inch or fine gravel at the surface. When there is a hard, gravelly subsoil and good natural drainage less excavation is required.

—Grape vines can be grafted, although grafting has not been much practiced in this country. Various methods of grafting have been recommended, but the following is probably as good as any: The old vine should be cut off below the ground early in the spring, and before the sap has started, and cleft in the same manner as an apple or pear stock. The cutting is prepared and inserted in the manner usual with other grafts. The stock is bound up and the earth replaced. The cutting should have one eye left above the ground.

Family Fun.

A Simple "Culled" Man.

"I ha come to you for some advice, Kurnel, as I don't know nuffin' about politics," said an old colored man to a candidate for Congress; "we ain't fit anyhow to mix up in politics." "Why, uncle Mose, I look upon you as one of the most intelligent of your race! I can learn from you." The old man shook his head depreciatingly, and, producing a nickel, asked: "Kurnel, how much am a nickel wuff?" "Ha, ha, ha—very good! I have always said there is more genuine humor in the African race than in any other." "But, serious, hoss, how much is it wuff?" "Five cents." "Jess 'samine dat air coin, hoss, and lemme know his cash value." The candidate took the coin, examined it, and returned it with the remark that it was not worth anything, as it was a bad nickel. "But s'posin' I contrib fifty votes oh de niggs' sons of liberty!" "A most worthy organization." "And s'posin' I was to tell dem voters dat a prominent candidate had cheated dis ole nigger!" "Who was it?" asked the candidate breathlessly. "Nebber mind, hoss; I's humble for information now. S'posin' I was to tell 'em one oh de candidates had gub me dat bad nickel!" The candidate looked worried, and again asked the name of the fiendish candidate. "You ar' de man! You gub me dat ar' nickel in de change for white washin' yore fence. I ha done work for all de odder four candidates, and you is de only one who has taken advantage oh de ignorance and simplicity oh de culled race. De secret has been confined to my own breast, bet hit am struggling foah freedom. Boss, how much did I hand you say dis lead nickel ham wuff in a close election fifteen de head ans is gwine to be?" The Caucasian statesman rested his massive brow on his hand, and thought, and thought, and thought. "Hit's getting late, and dar am a business meetin' ob de rain' sons dis ebening." The statesman wrote in a bold round hand "Fifty dollars on a blotting-pad, and pushed it across the table. The old man took the pencil and changed this sum into one hundred dollars. "They will not support any other candidate?" "Does I look like a deceptive, unreliable niggah? Does I look like a fictitious culled man? De rain' sons will rally 'round yer like yer was a demijohn." The money was paid over, the candidate remarking, "This is my contribution towards establishing a school in your ward. I want to see the colored man more intelligent, I do." "I hope dar am no mash lead nickels in dis money." "I hope so too." "We needs schools powerful bad, bekase we is ignorant and liable to be tuck in by designin' bad men." "But, now, give me that nickel." "Hush it ses. I ain't got no mosh use for it. You is de las' candidate I have been to see wid dat ar' nickel. I have don clared more den two hundred dollars with dat nickel. All de udder tree candidates had done paid up dar assessments, hush, hush!"—and the old scoundrel went off into one of his indescribable guffaws.

THE BIBLE.

An Instructive and Eloquent Sermon by Rev. Fr. Miles, S.J., of New Orleans.

[Specially reported for the New Orleans Morning Star.]

The spirit of truth, who proceedeth from the Father, he shall give testimony to me; and you shall give testimony because you are with me from the beginning—John xv 26, 27.

Our Blessed Redeemer is the infallible God, and while on earth taught with the fullness of divine authority. He could then, without wronging us, command that we should accept his doctrine under forfeiture of salvation. But when the Son of God went back to Heaven, He must have left some means of perpetuating his doctrine, and extending the knowledge of it to mankind, for it were a blasphemy to say that goodness itself and essential justice could condemn us to endless torments because we fail to believe a doctrine, or put it into practice, on account of our ignorance as to its being a point of Revelation. This means of spreading the religion of Christ, and of acquiring the knowledge of what He taught, is called the Rule of Faith. Catholics have always maintained this Rule of Faith to be the Church of the living God, constituted by Him to teach his religion throughout the world and protected from error by the promise which he has made to be with her always even to the end of time. Outside the pale of Holy Mother Church, it is asserted, by those who believe in Christ, that THE ONLY RULE OF FAITH IS THE BIBLE, the whole Bible, and nothing but the Bible. The Bible, for our separated brethren is self-accredited, and, according to them, ought to be freely read, as well as freely interpreted. This question has of late become one of general interest, and found its way into the public prints. For some time past the newspapers, far and wide, have been airing certain theories of their own with regard to a new edition of the Word of God. At such moments it is the duty of Catholics to give an account of the faith within them, and hence this morning I propose to speak to you about the Bible. In language again and simple as may be I will show you that, without some living and infallible authority to explain it, the Bible, in itself, never was, nor cannot be appointed by God as the Rule of Faith.

Well, then, the Apostles and Disciples went forth preaching everywhere, and planted the Church of God from Judea to Spain and the Indies, but never thought of writing, and when they did write only six of them wrote anything. Whereas, if the intention of Jesus had been that men should learn his religion from the written Gospel, all of them would have been authors. Besides, in writing, the Apostles nowhere give a complete summary of what is necessary to be believed. They address themselves to individuals or to local churches in order to strengthen them in the doctrine received from their mouths, or from ministers ordained by them. St. Matthew was the first to take pen in hand. His Gospel was written seven years after our Lord went back to heaven; so that the poor Church of Christ had to exist seven years without a single line of the Rule of Faith! St. Mark wrote about ten years after the Ascension. St. Luke about twenty-five. St. John did not finish writing till the last ten years of the first century; that is about forty years after the period when St. Paul wrote to the Romans: "Your faith is spoken of in the world." So the Church established by Christ had lived nearly one hundred years before the Gospel was completed. Now allow me to ask you, dearly beloved brethren can any one have so little heart, or a judgment so perverted as to deny the title of Christians to those followers of the Saviour who lived between the establishment of the Church, and the finishing of the Gospel? I hope not, for they are the first fruit of the blood of Jesus, and sealed their belief with their lives. The primitive Christians were in all respects our models. But how did they acquire the knowledge of what was necessary for Salvation? Not from the Gospel; for as we have seen they were not yet completed. They know it precisely, beloved brethren, in the same manner that you and I know it. They knew it from the teaching of the infallible Church of God, divinely commissioned by the spirit of truth to give testimony concerning the doctrine of the Redeemer, and not only vested with the power of laying certain written matter before us as the word of God, but enjoying as well the exclusive privilege of defining its true meaning. But and we shall see that for over three hundred years the faithful did not know what writings really made up the Gospels, and hence could not take the Bible for a Rule of Faith. In the first ages of the Church many false Gospels and spurious Epistles were written. No one could testify to the inspiration of this or that book. Even the learned were at a loss to know whether the preference should be given to the Gospel of Nicodemus or to that of Matthew, or to the Gospel of the Infancy of Jesus or to that of St. John. They needed some witnesses outside of the Gospel to testify to their divine inspiration, and to rescue them from the doubt thrown over their identity by lapse of time and by criticism. It was not until the fourth century when the Pope assembled in council with the Bishops of the world and assisted by the spirit of Truth, proclaimed the Gospels, as we Catholics have them now, to be the inspired word of God, that the Christian people could know beyond doubt what was the Gospel and what was not. Now think you that the heart of Jesus did not love his chosen ones with a deeper love than the which could allow Him to leave them for three centuries in the dark with regard to book from which alone they were to lean His Religion! Oh, surely, if only the written Gospel had been in His mind the Rule of Faith, He could never have left his people so long in doubt as to which writings did and which did not belong to the inspired Volume.

LET US ADVANCE FURTHER STILL,

and we will see that not only for three centuries but for one thousand four hundred years the Christian world at large had not to do without the Bible alone as a Rule of Faith. This may seem strange but it is nevertheless true. For remember we have said the Rule of Faith must be within easy reach of every one. Now, before the invention of the art of printing about four hundred years ago, the bible was an exceedingly rare and costly book. It was noted easy access to all. Nay! men who are expert at figures tell us it would have required a respectable fortune to procure oneself a Bible, and that a lifetime would have been necessary to write out a copy. Would not THIS be a rather exceedingly dear price for the Rule of Faith? However, if the poor man in those days wished to keep beneath his roof in the shape of the Bible, and earned the value of a dollar a day, he would have had to work and hoard up his money for more than 20 years before he could comply with the solemn obligation of having the Rule of Faith, even at that respectable price. But let us suppose that every man, woman and child had a copy of the Bible, although it is sure that not one in ten thousand—not one in twenty thousand—had the Holy Book. Of what use would the thirteen hundred chapters, and the thirty-four thousand verses, of the Bible have been to these people? None at all, because they did not know how to read. Why! in those days reading was an accomplishment that even royalty disdained. If, in this nineteenth century of ours, which boasts of its enlightenment and its widespread civilization, one half of the inhabitants of the earth cannot read, what think you must have been the condition of mankind in the beginning of the Church, and in those times which modern Sciolists are pleased to term the darkest.

Only cast a glance on the different denominations outside the Holy Catholic Church, and it will be impossible for you not to see the truth of what I assert. It is not my intention to offend those who neither love nor worship as we do. I only wish you to know what befalls the glowing flame of God's word under the icy breath of doubt, and the blasting winds of free examination. The sincere Episcopalian declines from the Bible that there must be Bishops. "You are mistaken," says the Presbyterian, "for I have the authority of the Good Book to prove that there can be only Presbyters or Elders." "Friends," exclaim the honest Baptist, "I fear me much you are not Christians. To baptize from the Greek means to immerse, and you have never gone down into the river with Christ, but were only sprinkled when you were infants." "Why trouble yourselves about such useless ceremonies," says the Universalists, "my Book tells me there is no hell.

"IS THAT ALL?" CHIMES IN THE UNITARIAN.

"Why, the Bible teaches me there is no Trinity, and that Christ is a man, and God." "Never mind, brethren," cries out the Methodist, "only feel religion, and let the spirit of God move withinyou, and all will be well." "Far from it," rejoins the Quaker, "have you not read in the Bible that man must work out his salvation in fear and trembling? And thus every man who is not a Catholic makes the Bible say what he pleases. And the Rule of Faith, which ought to preclude all fear of mistake or error produces only discord and dissension even in essential and fundamental doctrine. Christ is God; Christ is not God. Can both things be true? There is a hell; there is no hell. Can both assertions stand? There are bishops; there are no bishops. There is a baptism; there is no baptism. Somebody must be wrong. There is a sad blunder somewhere. But who is right? He who has the true meaning of the Word of God. But the Bible does not say who that is, for after all it is a book, and cannot explain itself, whence it requires the authority of a divinely aided witness to give its true meaning, to the which private judgment can lay no claim. God forbid that ought I have said, dearly beloved brethren, should tend to lessen your veneration for the Holy Book.

IF ANY ONE LOVES THE BIBLE

The Catholic Church most surely does. Her devotion to it is one of the most striking of her characteristics. It is the charter deed of her rights, and she hurls the bolts of God's vengeance against those who would seek to alter even its smallest word. But for her unflinching vigilance and jealous care, the Bible would never have been preserved, and those outside her fold would never have had even their fragment of truth. Her ministers go over a portion of it every day in their breviaries. At Mass, before reading the Sacred Word, the priest, bending low before the tabernacle, begs of God to purify his heart and lips in order that he may be made worthy to recite the Blessed Evangel and he finishes by imprinting upon the sacred Volume a kiss of love and veneration, saying. Per evangelica dicta deleantur nostra delicta." "May our sins be blotted out by virtue of these holy gospels."

NOR IS THERE FEAR THAT THE INDIVIDUAL CATHOLIC

May underrate the value of the Bible. He knows that it is the Book of God, and for that very reason he knows that his loving Father, who is in heaven, must have delegated some unerring authority to give him its true meaning. With respect to the Bible he places himself in same measure as the American citizen does with regard to the Constitution of our United States. When this glorious Republic was established, George Washington and other heroes gave to the Constitution the mission to preserve the Union of the different States. It was not their intention that each citizen should go by his explanation of the Constitution. Along with the Constitution and the supreme law were instituted the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Judge of the Constitution, whose decisions and explanations should be looked upon as true, and binding alike on the President of the nation and on the most unlettered citizen. So it is in every well-ordered commonwealth. So it is in the case of the Catholic. Christ established His Kingdom on earth, and gave us a Supreme Court, a Supreme Judge, to make us one in faith, and expound the true meaning of His doctrine and revelation. Christ, who can neither deceive nor be deceived, has assured us that His Supreme Court partakes of His infallibility, and therefore the Catholic, without fear of mistake or error, accepts the Holy Bible. He says "I believe this or that to be the meaning of the bible, because the Church teaches me how I believe it. Church because she is the infallible delegate of God. Therefore I believe upon the authority of God, because God has spoken. It is then A MATTER QUITE SMALL AND INDIFFERENT TO THE CATHOLIC

This quibbling of learned grammarians and illustrious divines, who, in the 16th century, found in the Bible of the 30,000 mistakes which the eminent Protestant divines admit to be contained therein. Abstracting from this authority of the Church, we would have to pin our supernatural faith on some little literary genius. No critic or linguist, however competent, is able to decide in any particular place, what is the genuine reading of the original, what verses are genuine, and what are not, what documents and what part of documents constitute the Scriptures. For this we need the teaching of the Church, their infallible accreditor. We can rely on no version as accurate and reliable independently of the Church's confirmation. We are bound to believe that the books contained in the Latin Vulgate are sacred and canonical, and constitute indeed the Holy Scriptures. Our Latin translation has been declared a substantially faithful version from the Hebrew and the Greek, and the Holy See has solemnly confirmed the indorsement given by the Second Council of Baltimore to the Douay version of the Bible for English speaking Catholics.

LET US THEN LOVE THE BIBLE

And read it with care in submission to the infallible Church, for I here denounce as false the charge of those who say a Catholic may not read the Bible. Their whatever noble passions of the soul we wish to awaken, whatever bright hopes we seek to kindle within, we need only turn to the sacred Volume. There the laws of nature are explained, there man's origin is described, and his destiny evolved. Then the clouds which darken the horizon of the past melt away before the living light with which the future beams. Let us read in the Bible with submission to the interpretation of the Church, and then indeed it will be truly unto us the Word of God, the food of mind and soul, of which all who taste shall live unto salvation. The grace I wish you all in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen.

SCANDAL.

How the Press of To-day Destroys Our Children.

We often speak of "scandal" as something that shocks or startles us, but the word has a much deeper meaning than that. Well instructed Catholics understand the word in its truer and more scientific sense of "stumbling block," something down which indueces others to do the like, or at least suggests it to them. Viewed in this light, "scandal" is one of the heaviest counts against a man who does wrong. He may obtain God's forgiveness more easily than he did the wrong, but the bad consequences of his deeds on others are incalculable. Man is at imitative creature, and the evil deeds of others, if they do not suggest kindred desires to him, at all events breed an unhealthy curiosity. A man attempts the life of a sovereign or some other man in authority, and we are pretty sure ere long to hear of like attempt elsewhere. Cheap novels are a prolific source of "scandal." In the United States they appear to do a huge amount of harm, and our contemporaries constantly record cases of juvenile depravity traced to what are called "dime novels." Even the phlegmatic Hollanders' soul is moved by such pernicious trash, for we read of a murder committed at the Hague by one Marius Bogaerdt on the son of a retired Java merchant named DeJongh. The fellow enticed the boy out for a walk on the Downs, intending to keep him hid until he had extorted a ransom from the father. The boy threatened to raise an alarm, and Bogaerdt killed him. The murderer confessed that he had been reading a story in the Holland Illustrated Journal, in which the abduction of a child to secure a large inheritance was related, and the idea had worked upon him.

Nor are cheap novels the only stumbling blocks of the rising generation. The correspondents of the provincial papers are not altogether blameless. Writing as these correspondents do, in a light and airy style of uncleanness and frivolity, they suggest a good deal to a number of youths of humble life who, when disasters are few and dull, engage. They may not perhaps be answerable for heavy crimes, but they help to form a sort of pinchback youth, the counterfeit of the "jeunesse doree," whose doings the correspondents relate. Would that some one could be found to convince the youthful readers of novels and newspaper correspondences what precious wealth they are throwing away.

—A part little girl boasted to one of her friends that "her father kept a carriage." "Ah, but," was the triumphant reply, "my father drives an omnibus."

ROMAN CORRESPONDENCE.

June 6, 1881.

THE VATICAN—His Holiness received in private audience on the 31st of May, Father Boulard, a Boston parish priest and founder of the institutes of Our Lady of Victories in that city. The Holy Father made many inquiries concerning the progress of religion in the United States, and especially in reference to the labors of F. Boulard among the French colony in Boston, and gave him a beautiful copy of the statue of St. Peter to be placed in the Boston church of Our Lady of Victories. Father Boulard also received, through means of Mgr. Boccali, Private Chamberlain to his Holiness, a relic of St. Anne, the special protectress of Catholics in New England. Leo XIII. sent through Father Boulard a special benediction to the Archbishop of Boston, Dr. Williams During this week there were no general audiences. The Holy Father gave private audiences to the Bishop of Salford (on his leaving Rome,) to Cardinals (Gianelli, Jacobini, Bilio and Alimonda; to the Bishop of Barcelona on the evening of June 3; to the Bishop of Maitland, Dr. Murray, on the evening of the 4th, and to several leading members of the Spanish pilgrimage. His Holiness is in excellent health. Bishop Kirby and the Rev. Dr. Maher had private audience of the Pope on the evening of Whitsunday.

DEATH OF BISHOP ANIVITI.—The Roman clergy and laity have sustained a severe loss by the death on the morning of May 29, of the prelate Bishop of Carsium Mgr. Vincenzo Aniviti, Bishop of Carsium in partibus infidelium, Canon of St John Lateran, and auxiliary of Cardinal Bilio in the see of Sabina. The deceased prelate was born Sept. 23, 1823, and was from his youth distinguished by his humility, piety and amiability. As a priest he was indefatigable in labor and studies, and for years past has been esteemed one of the most learned and talented of the Roman clergy. He was an active member of various Academies and Scientific Associations, and was a accomplished and effective preacher. He was held in much favor by the late and by the present Pontiffs. Leo XIII., on his accession to the throne, showed his estimate of the worth of Aniviti by desiring to have him near his person as Cameriere Segreto Participante, and by subsequently promoting him to the episcopate. It is well known that still higher honors would have been offered to Bishop Aniviti, had not death terminated his useful and brilliant career. During his last illness an immense number of persons, prelates, and Cardinals visited the sick-bed of Mgr. Aniviti to implore his blessing, and many fervent prayers were offered for his recovery. He himself had a presentiment of his approaching end, and waited for death with calmness and happiness, holding to the last in his hands the Crucifix, the sign of the cross in which he had incessantly labored. His body was exposed after his death in the private oratory of Sta. Maria della Pace, and was visited by thousands of persons of all ranks of life. At 9 a. m. on Tuesday, May 31, it was removed to the church of Sta. Maria della Pace, from No. 5, Via dell' Arco della Pace, the funeral cortege consisting of three Confraternities with their respective standards, the clergy and parish priests of Rome, and Archbishop Lenti, Vicegerent of Rome. The bier, surmounted by the episcopal insignia, was carried on the shoulders of several gentlemen, personal friends of the deceased. The pall bearers were Mgr. Scapinelli, Professor Contini, Professor Gulli, and Professor Murini. Among those taking part in the ceremony were Archbishop Grassoli and Chiaroni, the President of the Academy of Noble Ecclesiastics, Bishop Schiaffino, the Bishops of Sogni and Amelia, Monsignore Domenico Jacobini, Bruno, Dehiosi, Bartolini and Trripoli. The funeral Mass was pontificated by Monsignor Dunckers, and the absolutions were given by Cardinal Bilio. Cardinal Di Pietro, Monsignor Ricci, Majordomo of his Holiness, Mgr. Boccali, Privy Chamberlain Participante, and a number of prelates assisted at the functions. The transport of the corpse to Campo Verano took place at 4 p. m., and was most imposing. The Confraternity of "Della Morte" and "Addolorata," preceded the hearse, and hundreds of clergy in black robes followed it. Country and citizens in crowds accompanied the procession to show respect to a prelate who, by his learning, charity, and modesty of bearing had earned for himself the title of the "Apostle of Rome."

PRIME PROSECUTIONS.—The Crown prosecutors in Rome have commenced proceedings against Signor Alberto Mario, Editor of the Popolo Democratico, on a charge of "exciting contempt and hatred for the person of the King and the institutions of the State, and for making an appeal to war." Signor Mario and his wife (nee Jessie White) are old Revolutionists, and formerly plotted against the Grand Duke of Tuscany. Several Republican newspapers in various parts of Italy were recently seized and prosecuted for articles offensive to the Government.

SPANISH PILGRIMAGE.—Some three hundred and fifty Spaniards of the province of Cataloniа arrived in Rome on May 30, under the direction of the Bishop of Barcelona. They will be received in audience by the Pope on Tuesday, June 7.

THE PROPAGANDA.—Professor Francesco Segna, one of the Minutanti of Propaganda, has been nominated a Consultore of the Special Congregation of Propaganda for Oriental Affairs, and also a Consultore of the General Congregation of Propaganda. The Rev. Francesco Satolli, Professor of Dogmatic Theology in the Propaganda, has been nominated a Consultore of the Congregation of the Index.

DREADFUL ACCIDENT.—Every week in Rome the journals record serious accidents, and oftentimes deaths, from the falling of scaffolding. An incredible amount of carelessness is displayed in the construction of the early part of this year some eight or ten masons were killed, and a score or two wounded so seriously as to be rendered incapable of labor for the rest of their lives by the falling of "bridges," and again a more fatal accident has occurred. Six men and two women were engaged working at a house nearly finished at the corner of the Via Volturno, near the New Finance Ministry. They were trying to put an enormous slab of stone in its place in the cornice when the scaffolding poles shifted a little and the planking gave way and the eight persons, with the slab of stone with them, were precipitated down the inside of the building, from the top story to the bottom, breaking through, in their descent, the vaulted roof of the ground floor, where other men were working. Two men and one woman, a widow, with a child aged twelve years, were instantly killed. The other woman, who was enceinte, was conveyed to the hospital and died immediately after admission. That young women should be employed to carry mortar up ladders and inclines is a sign of the hardship of the life of the poor under the present Government. Seven poor fellows, the rest of the sufferers by this accident, now lie in the hospital in a hopeless state. They may possibly escape immediate death, but they will be almost all of them prevented from earning their bread by labor during the remainder of their lives. The funeral of the four persons killed took place on the evening of the 2nd of June, and was attended by thousands of laboring men, with the banners and music of their guilds or associations. Those who remember the working classes under the Papal Government see a great difference between the former good looks and cheerful aspect, and their present gloomy and careworn appearance. They look morose, badly clad, and poorly fed, and the life and spirit of former days seem gone out of them. Wages have not risen in proportion to the advance in rent and price of necessaries. The sad record of the frequent, nay daily, suicides shows how hopeless and insupportable life has become for the poor in modern-led Rome.

WHIT-SUNDAY.—The 5th of June is the Festival of Whit-Sunday, and also of the "Statuto." The Government Festival was celebrated by the usual review of the troops in garrison by King Humbert at Maccao, a banquet at the Quirinal, and a display of fireworks at the Castle of St. Angelo. The Church commemorated the day by a general communion for the purpose of gaining the Jubilee. For eight days previously in all the principal churches devoted missionaries preached to crowded congregations with this object. In the poorer quarters of the city the sermons were at 5.30 a. m. and again after the Ave Maria.

RAFFAEL.—A last a monument is to be erected in honor of the great painter, the "divine Raffaello Sanzio." A committee has been formed at Urbino to erect a statue to him, and the sculptors of all Italy have been invited to send in designs. The tomb in the Pantheon is marked only by a mural slab with the epitaph from the pen of Cardinal Bembo—"Ille hic est Raphael timuit quo sospite vinci Rerum magna parens, et moriente mori."

THE BISHOP OF SALFORD.—The Right Rev. Dr. Vaughan, Bishop of Salford, having previously had a private and farewell audience with the Holy Father, left Rome on June 2nd for Florence, accompanied by Monsignor Gadd. The bishop has been recommended to visit one of the Continental watering-places on his way home-wards to England.

THE NUNS OF THE PERPETUAL ADORATION.—In the Convent of the Perpetual Adoration in the Via Diminale there was an interesting exposition on the 26th, 27th, 28th, and 29th of May, of altar vestments and ornaments for poor churches in Italy, and for missions. There is unfortunately much poverty in Italy, and in many places the Bishops and priests, being deprived of their former ecclesiastical revenues, are unable, without appeals to charity, to provide for the decorous celebration of divine services. The ladies of the Convent of the Perpetual Adoration in the Viminale, perform a good work in endeavoring to supply the wants of poor churches, and deserve the generous assistance of devout Catholics.

THE CARAVITA.—It was rumored that the ancient Oratory of the Caravita was to be seized by the Italian Government, and closed for divine service in order to be turned into a library to contain the books of the Vallicellian bibliotheca. A communication was, it was said, to be opened by means of a gallery between the Caravita and the Vicar Emmanuel Tonello. A somewhat evasive statement in part denial of this rumor has appeared in the Italian newspapers.

THE BISHOP OF CLIFTON.—The health of Dr. Clifford, Bishop of Clifton, is most satisfactory, and he is rapidly recovering from the weakness incident to the operation performed by Dr. Ceccarelli.

A Flourishing Organization.

At a meeting of the Board of Directory of the Catholic Mutual Benefit Association of the Archdiocese of San Francisco, held on July 4, 1881, reports were presented from the several officers, showing that the organization has extended to a substantial manner to 36 districts, embracing nearly the whole of California and portions of Oregon.

After carefully examining all books, vouchers, etc., of the Secretary and Treasurer, the Auditing Committee, consisting of Rev. J. B. McNally, John McLaughlin and Thomas O'Brien, reported every detail correct, receipts and disbursements accurately accounted for, and surplus deposited in Hibernia Bank. Amongst other proceedings, the following resolution was unanimously adopted.

Resolved, That the thanks of the Board be tendered to our retiring Treasurer, Thaddeus Flass, Esq., for the thorough, businesslike, honest and efficient manner in which he performed the duties of his office for the past year, and for which he was so highly commended by the Auditing Committee.

The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: Rev. J. B. McNally, President; John McLaughlin, Vice-President; A. Fonte, Treasurer; and Edward Gilson, Secretary.

Another Police Circular.

Still another police circular! This time the document comes to light with the approval of the authorities. Though it is little less startling than those already exposed, the Government, doubtless, did not care to be caught issuing a fresh batch of secret instructions, and so they have given their latest circular to the press for publication. The inspo.-general says in it that he is desired by the Government to instruct the county inspectors of constabulary to put themselves at once in communication with the subalterns of their respective counties, informing these gentlemen that the constabulary authorities must be supplied with timely notice of any sales, writs, or other legal processes. In carrying the law into execution the sheriff is to have as many soldiers and police as he thinks necessary. The Government, however, must, have ample time for preparation, so that they may post proclamations warning all persons that any assembly for the purpose of obstructing the sheriff is an unlawful and criminal act, and that any persons so assembling will be dispersed by force. Finally the circular informs the subalterns that it is desirable that matters should be so arranged that writs and other processes to be executed in the same locality should, if possible, be all executed on the one day. Formerly the sheriff had to appeal to the Government for armed assistance. The system of procedure is entirely reversed by the new instructions. The armed forces of the crown are now to be pressed upon the sheriff, and the landlords, in their crusade against the comfort and even the lives of the people, may have as many soldiers and police as they like to apply for.—Nation.

The President.

GRAPHIC DESCRIPTION OF HIS ATTEMPTED ASSASSINATION.

Sketches of the Assassin.

WASHINGTON, July 13.—Following are extracts related by Colonel Rockwell: After expressing strong hopes of the President's recovery, he was asked, "How is it you were with the President at the time of the shooting?"

"You see," said the Colonel, "the boys, Rosser and Harry, started off in the Presidential party to Williams College, Mass., where, who was stopping on F. street. The President had arranged the night before for a military Hallow to call at the mansion to do the depot with him. The Secretary had ordered his own carriage. Mine was reserve, and followed just behind the Secretary. I had several pieces of baggage in his own carriage. Mine was reserve, and followed just behind the Secretary. I had several pieces of baggage in his own carriage. Mine was in the baggage-room, and was getting the pieces when I heard two cracks, with an interval between them as fast as I could manage to cock a pistol. On the sill of the door I saw from the ladies parlor into the general reception-room or main room, stood Henry Hinne, calling for me and pointing to the world-be assassin, Guiteau. It was terrible thought, but nevertheless one bullet flashed across my mind, that the President had been shot. Quickly I had the President's carriage brought to the door, cushions arranged to make the resident as comfortable as possible, and I prepared to take him directly to the depot.

THE PHYSICIANS ADVISED AGAINST IT.

But I had written from his dictation a pleasing telegram to his wife, and fearly lest the President should be upset in transferring to the ambulance. The President put his right hand in mine, and the President insisted on being carried upstairs, their mansion. They were not six feet apart. The instant the President was down, his intense sensitivity of mind and nerves made him aggressive, and it was that he received

THE STAGGERING BULLET,

He fell forward against the wainscotting of the reception-room, at the head of the stairs leading to the main hall. Till now the President seems to have gained that Guiteau's act was done so quickly the President not comprehend what was going on. It was, as I told you a while ago, the reflex of the firing were so close together that it could not have been longer than it would take to cock a pistol. Yet, during this time, Guiteau was advancing, and the President preparing to advance upon his assailant. Any one who will take his watch and carefully observe the beats of the second hand will be surprised at the distance one can get over in a single second if impelled by a strong motive. The position in which Guiteau stood made it necessary for him to shoot at nearly an angle of forty degrees, while the position of the body of the President was also at about the same angle with the seats when the ball struck his right side. With this understanding of the position of the two, the accident the ball met with great resistance, and was deflected. Its natural course would have been through the body, passing just over the heart, and in a reasonable theory that, upon reaching the interior of the body, its force had lessened and exhausted, and internal injury is less than first supposed. All of which gladdens up with a hope that the President may live his recovery is now only a question of time.

Guiteau the Assassin.

It has been discovered that Guiteau the would-be assassin of the President was once a member of the Plymouth Church, and that he also belonged to one of the Plymouth Bible classes, but his connection with the church was severed long ago, and he could only lasted two years. Mr. Hill, who taught the class of which Guiteau was a member, when asked about it said he remembered the young man well enough, having had personal experience with him which clearly indicated the insincerity of his character. This he explained by saying that the very first time he met him he was asked to pray, and he did so, but with flushed actions my mind, that the man was not in the thought, but nevertheless one bullet flashed across my mind, that the President had been shot. Quickly I had the President's carriage brought to the door, cushions arranged to make the President as comfortable as possible, and I prepared to take him directly to the depot.

Poetry.

HAVE HOPE.

REV. A. J. STAN.

The shadow of the mountain falls athwart the lowly plain,
And the shadow of the cloudlet hangs above the mountlet's head;
And the highest hearts and lowest wear the shadow of some pain,
And the smile has scarcely flitted ere the anguish tear is shed.

For no eyes have there been ever without a weary tear,
And those lips cannot be human which have never heaved a sigh;
For without the dreary winter there has never been a year,
And the tempests hide their terrors in the calmest summer sky.

So the dreary life is passing, and we move amid its scenes,
And we grope along together, half in darkness, half in light,
And our hearts are often hardened by the mysteries of our ways
Which are never all in shadow and are never wholly bright.

And our dim eyes ask a beacon and our weary feet a guide,
And our hearts of all life's mysteries seek the meaning and the key;
And a cross gleams o'er pathway, on it hangs the world's Redeemer
And he answers all our yearnings by the whisper "Follow Me."

Literary Miscellany.

Mountain Dew, and How It's Made.

When Rory O'Rourden arrived in London from Killarney, on a visit to his brother Pat, his brother, who had been several years away from home, was, as might well be expected, somewhat anxious to ascertain how things had been going on during his absence. Seated before a large fire, with a fair supply of what is familiarly styled in Ireland "the native" upon the table, they tried to satisfy each other's curiosity as best they could.

"Come now, Rory," said Pat, "mix yerself a glass a punch, and make yerself at home."

"Egad, and that I'll do," answered Rory; "I am many is the good one I've mixed in my time. You haven't got the stuff as good here as at home, Pat, have you?"

"Oh, bless you, much better: we've got all kinds av whiskey in London—English, Irish, an' Scotch," replied Pat.

"Well," continued Rory, "it's not as good as you'd get at home, any way, Pat, me boy; nor it couldn't be expected, for—

"But you know," interrupted Pat, "we got the very best Irish whiskey over here."

"Ah," resumed Rory, "I'll leave me, it gets taste av the water comin' over. How, an-ever, let me see [tastes]; well, faith, it's not so bad as I expected, not too bad; but it haven't the Killarney flavor about it after all."

At this stage of the proceedings Rory, fearing lest he was too obstinately upholding his opinion upon a subject with which he had limited experience, endeavored to extend his acquaintance still further by making a second trial, drawing over his chair towards the chair of his brother, asked him:

"Did Phelim O'Toole keep the still going on in the Rocks as usual?"

"Hush!" warned Rory.

"But," remonstrated Pat, "between us two you needn't be so reserved."

"Well," said Rory, "between you and me, he do keep it going on still; but on the quiet—"

"Oh, not at all," answered Pat; "but he'll be taken."

"Taken!" exclaimed Rory rather loudly, as he had just swallowed a draught of the beverage, which unfortunately ran counter to his breath; "why, there ain't a man who doesn't know him than wouldn't rather give themselves up than discover on."

"But the sort of people goin' now—"

"Why," interrupted Rory, "all the people in half the whole country knows it these twenty years, an' see he wor niver discovered. The way it is, you see, everyone likes 'em, and when anyone goes there he don't bide it, but gives 'em a taste av it; an' such as he knows are fond av it, he gives 'em plenty. Sure, when the first outbreak of all took place in Kerry among the Fenians, the insurgents called on him, an' he stood the throp like a man, and gave 'em a bottle apiece gain' away. An' do you mean to say they, or anyone else'll discover on 'em after that? Why, there ain't a man among them would not parfer goin' to prison himself than see 'em goin'. Besides, he's a doctor, an' attends all the people for ten miles round for nobhin; but they generally sends him fowl and praties, and things in that line every Christmas an' Aster—which amounts to as much in the end as if he charge—an' the good-will of the people to boot."

"But how does he manage to outwit the gauger?" inquired Pat.

"Manage to outwit the gauger!" repeated Rory, taking advantage of the interruption to renew his application to the bottle; "why the same follow'd manage to outwit an archbishop. The way he manages is this: He passes off among the gaugers as a chemist, and the instrument he has for doing the business wd, he tells 'em, is what he uses for trying experiments on. He keeps it in an outhouse, which he calls his study, an' the gauger saw it, an' smelt it a hundred times over; an' the same instrument is there still, making the best whiskey that ever went down a man's throat without payin' a copper duty on it. Some say the gauger is bribed; but a man av Phelim's detection 'ud never have the condescension to sit such fellows as gaugers to overlook his capers. They ain't a bit better educated than the police; an' the examination they have to pass in order to get admission into the ranks is to kep over a stock av rules to do some vulgar fractions, but av 'em is vulgar enough to do all the fractions that ever was made over their own accord, which is such as going the rounds for the first time, he towld it to the neighbors on the bridge av Ballinaboola that he had travelled all parts. And the people believed 'em an' said he'd non be as great a man as the landlord 'omself."

Here Rory completed the draught "Pat wasn't taking anything worth speakin' av;" but whether the expression was prompted by any anxiety on his part at not seeing his brother, as he thought, enjoy himself, or was intended to insinuate that other persons weren't doing as much in that way as they could have wished, it is unfortunately rather difficult to say, and must for ever remain a mystery. If, however, it were the latter—and we hope we are not exceeding the bounds of fair and legitimate criticism when we record our belief to the effect that it was—the insinuation was attended with the anticipated success. Pat stimulated himself in the most homely and straight-forward English neither to mind him nor to be shy, but to act just as if he were at home. While Rory was mixing another glass, Pat expressed a hope that Phelim wouldn't be detected.

"You needn't have the least apprehension av that; it's impossible for 'em to be found out; gaugers is there wid 'em every day in the week an' th' instrument workers' afore their eyes, an' yit they can't discover what he's about. But 'tis one av the funniest things in all the world to listen to 'em explainin' to the gaugers the great progress he's making in experimental science by means av the help av the instrument, an' they noddin' their heads out av respect for his great learnin,' pretendin' to understand his explanations, but they know just as much about them as they do about the sun, moon, and stars.

"Then the whole of the machinery of the matter is down underground where all the business is done, but it's only one man out of a hundred thousand that's allowed to see it; the entrance to it is from the dwelling house, and it's so managed that the smoke av it comes through the chimney of his own kitchen, that's almost a quarter av a mile off. It's about the completest thing you see. When you'll be over in the summer I'll make you a look at it; Phelim sends a keg to me every quarter. So there is for you now the whole history of the art of private distillation, as practised under the Kerry in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty-seven, an' here goes the whole av this, the celebrated Rory, putting the glass to his mouth; and, having finished the contents, fell fast asleep.

The custom of illicit distillation, as detailed in this paper, is, we may take the liberty of remarking, fast falling into disuetude in Ireland. Some years ago it was carried to a great excess, but owing to the vigilance of those whose duty it was to suppress any illegal proceedings of this description, as well as to the severe punishment with which the offenders were visited, the custom is slowly but surely dying out; and in a short time hence will ago facto be a thing of the past.

ESCAPE OF JAMES STEPHENS.

An Interesting Fenian Confession.

To the Editor of the Sun—SIR: Being a participator in James Stephen's rescue from Richmond prison, I will give a plain, truthful statement of all the facts, not compromising anybody now within reach of the British Government. To the truth of this statement I am prepared at any time to make affidavit. John J. Breslin and Daniel Byrnes, now residing in New York, were at that time wardens in the prison; they had charge of the inside arrangements for the release. I had thirteen others, armed with revolvers and daggers, acting under orders, assembled at the "Bleeding Horse" liquor store, near the prison.

At 11 o'clock at night we concealed ourselves in a ditch outside the wall, where we lay until 1½ a. m., having orders to let nobody pass after 12 o'clock until Stephens was rescued; to use only daggers, not revolvers, unless absolutely necessary. Upon a preconcerted signal from friends inside, we hoisted a rope ladder at 1½ a. m. to the walls, by which James Stephens got over, which they succeeded in the release, six of us acted as a special guard, the remainder keeping within supporting distance behind. I will give the names of some of these six, who are alive and out of the reach of British tyranny: John Devoy, Dennis Dugan (one of the Catalpa rescuers), Colonel Thomas Kelly, all now living in New York city, and myself.

Being one who took part in the Fenian movements, I feel it incumbent upon me to say that the honesty and sterling patriotism of James Stephens are unquestionable. I decline to enter into any discussion of his leadership, and I feel perfectly safe in saying that every one associated with Fenianism would laugh to scorn the idea of James Stephens being a British spy. Poor man, he's all took places in his country, he gets for his reward the title of a British spy; but, thank God, there is not a patriotic Irishman in the world, although differing from him on some points, but would stake his life that James Stephens would never betray him, although a poor man to-day.

Now, it would be well to consider that after his escape, all the officials of the prison, Governor included, were dismissed, and a reward of £3,000 was offered for his re-capture, but nobody wanted the money.

JOHN HANSON, 448 Grove street.

JERSEY CITY, June 27.

Coming to Spread the Light.

The Rev. Mr. O'Connor, P. P., has received the following letter from the Archbishop of Cashel:

The Palace, Thurles, June 15th.

MY DEAR FATHER O'CONNOR—I write you a line to wish you a safe voyage across the Atlantic, and a large measure of success in the very arduous mission you have undertaken. You will have it in power to do us a great deal of good while lecturing in the States. Our position here, though understood by many in America, is not, I know, and cannot, until it is thoroughly gone into, be realised by those who have never been in Ireland. You will have an opportunity of explaining our case and condition to all who take an interest in our affairs. Proclaim everywhere what we want and what we do not want; and you can bear testimony, at the same time, to the patience of our people, to their sense of justice, and to their determination to carry on the present constitutional agitation until the present land code will have ceased to exist. I wish you every blessing, and I wish the same to all sympathising friends in the great country you are about to visit.

I am, my dear Father O'Connor, your very faithful servant,

T. W. CROKER, Asb. of Cashel.

Russia.

THE MEN WHO GIVE EXPRESSION TO PUBLIC OPINION.

Political Parties Russophiles, Liberals, Nihilists.

Interesting Account of Existing Affairs.

ST. PETERSBURG, June 5.—Notwithstanding all the assertions of the loyal Czarists that Russia is now safe from the machinations of politicians, it is evident that the troubles of the new Czar are likely to spring as much from the strife of the different political parties as from the Nihilist complots. Indeed, the Czar himself is merely a grand name for which the politicians are fighting. Perhaps never before in the history of Russia have there been such well-defined, strong and bitterly hostile parties as now, and certainly political wrangling has never before been so fierce.

Yesterday the Czar issued a new ukase proclaiming his acceptance of the resignation of Count Milutine, the Minister of War, the foremost personage among the Liberals, and appointing in his stead Gen. Wanowsky, an obsolescent tool of the Russophiles. The downfall of the Constitutionalists is now complete, and the victory of the supporters of autocracy is undisputed. Yet the defeated party is far from being silenced; on the contrary, it boldly raises its voice against the victors, shaking its quills at them, and defiantly pouring on them its anger and its ink. Indeed, never before have the Russian journals of the opposition been so bold and plain-spoken as now, and the frequent blunders of the new counsellors of the Czar give them ample opportunity for the display of their superior knowledge and experience.

The Ministry now in power is composed of the members of two parties, the Russophiles and the Slavophiles. These are temporarily united against their common enemies. Gen. Ignatieff, the Minister of the Interior, is a Slavophile, while Mr. Fobedonostoff, the Minister of Justice, is a Russophile. The other Ministers vacillate between the two parties. The harmony of the present Ministry is very doubtful, and it is not likely to last long.

At the head of the Slavophile party stands Ivan Aksakoff, the editor of the Rus, a newspaper published at Moscow. His political ideal is the ancient Russian Government, when the Czar ruled the country according to the counsels of the Zemsky Sobor—the assembly of the land representatives. The Slavophiles hold that since Peter the Great introduced into Russia European political notions, the people's government has disappeared, giving place to a non-national, bureaucratic government, and that since then the country has lived not for herself but for her masters. The giving up of the bureaucracy and the restitution of the oldan type of administration, they hold, is the way by which Russia can return to order and prosperity. It is doubtful, however, whether the Russians of the present day would submit to patriarchial government, even if it could be resurrected, for, in spite of the Slavophile dream of harmonizing autocracy with the freedom of the people, the two things are now generally held to be utterly incompatible. If to the Zemsky Sobor we add the communal peasant session of land and the right of artel (association), both genuine Russian institutions, it will be apparent that the Slavophile demands may prove in the end as dangerous to the Czar's power as those of Liberals, and even the Nihilists. Moscow has a monthly, the Rushkia Mysl, ("Russian Thought"), which, under the disguise of the Slavophile affair, is really teaching socialism. It denounces constitutionalism, and demands the Zemsky Sobor; it abhors communism, and applauds the obschina, the communal possession of land; it assails European socialism, co-operativism, and association, and stoutly upholds the artel principles, which is the same thing, only called by an old Russian name. Some of the Liberal organs already predict that before long Mr. Katkoff, the self-styled "saviour of his country," will be denouncing Slavophile radicalism as bitterly as he now denounces the Liberals and the Nihilists. The Golos has recently reminded the public that on a certain occasion Mr. Katkoff said: "The abyss of popular government is as dangerous as that of anarchy."

Mr. Michael Katkoff, the editor of the Moscow Vedomosti, is the undisputed head and soul of the Russophile party. He is undoubtedly the most original and interesting of all the Russian writers of the day. For the past thirty years Moscow and a considerable part of Russia has believed in what Mr. Katkoff was pleased to believe, and they have unhesitatingly endorsed whatever Mr. Katkoff has demanded. During the Polish insurrection, for instance, the Vedomosti cried out: "No quarter! Hang them!" Are all Russia echoed, "Hang them!" The bold figures of the Nihilists stalked upon the stage. "No use of trying them," shouted Mr. Katkoff; "hang them." And the legal courts were suspended, and the Nihilists were hunted down and slaughtered like beasts.

The Liberals hinted that, in order to insure the personal safety of the Czar, it would be advisable to divide his power with the people. The Moscow sage clamored, "Down with the Liberals!" and the Liberals were driven out of power. Mr. Katkoff is the warmest partisan of strong government. "Perish everybody and everything else, but long live the Czar!" This is the motto of Russian Cato.

The liberal reforms of the late Czar gave a great deal of trouble to the Moscow oracle. He grumbled when the serfs were set free; he beat the alarm when trial by jury was proclaimed, and he vociferated madly when the Czar granted a certain freedom to the press. He does not hesitate to scold this or that Minister, a thing that no other Russian writer dares to indulge in. In one point Mr. Katkoff meets with a general approval: he never tires of administering severe blows to the German-Russian officers, the Polish administrators, and the Jewish contractors. "Our Czar and the country can rely only upon Russian servants," he says. The policy of the Russophiles can be expressed in three words—"Autocracy, orthodoxy, and nationality."

The Liberal party was created by the late Czar, who needed new men to operate his great reforms. For the last quarter of a century the Liberals have been earnestly reforming every department of the national life. If Russia now looks a different country from the Russia of Nicholas, it is chiefly due to the work of the Liberals. The great reforms of the late Czar Alexander will go down to posterity with the liberal stamp. Instead of cursing the memory of Peter the Great for his having inoculated European civilization into Russia, as the Slavophiles do, the Liberals bless that great Czar, and hold that Russia has nothing now to do but to introduce the great institutions which have proved beneficent for western Europe. Their latest demand is a constitution, and it is generally believed here that by this time they would have obtained it had the revolutionists spared the life of Czar Alexander. Even now, though dismissed from the Ministry, they persist in their belief that the new Czar cannot long rule without their assistance. They hold that the lack of political freedom has caused and is feeding the revolutionary movement in Russia. The former Department of Justice, which made Militarism naturally provoked terrorism. Give political freedom and Nihilism will fall to the ground of itself. The number of the Liberals is legion. The great majority of the educated Russians are undoubtedly Liberal. They are everywhere—in the Czar's Cabinet, in the Council, in the Senate, in the Holy Synod, on the bench, and in the pulpit. The complicated bureaucratic machine is run by them, the army and navy are commanded by them, the youths taught by them, and the great majority of the journals and magazines published by them. Did they have as much will as power, Russia would have enjoyed a constitutional government years ago. The foremost among the Liberals are Counts Melikoff and Milutine, and the best of their journals are the Golos ("Voice"), and the Pozsdok ("Order").

The German and Polish parties must not be overlooked. The former, though left out in the cold after the death of the late Czar, are not disposed to yield their fat places to anybody. The latter are known as siding with the Constitutionalists. Both Germans and Poles are found in large numbers among the civil and military officers of the highest rank, and by no means can they be counted as loyal subjects.

The main body of the Nihilists aim at a peaceful revolution which will make a war with the Czardom and establish a republic, and which, in order to be successful, must be accomplished by the people themselves. But in order to protect their comrades in prison and to keep the revolutionary spirit in the people, and advanced men formed a political faction, small in numbers, but well organised, energetic, and audacious. This Nihilist faction is known under the name of the Terrorists, or the party of the Will of the People, in distinction from the peaceful Nihilists working under the banner of the Zemlia e Volia ("Land and Liberty"). The whole world has witnessed how desperate the Terrorists have plunged ahead, sprinkling their way with their own blood and with that of the Czar and the Czarists. The indescribable confusion that reigns in the mind of the ruling classes of Russia is chiefly due to the work of the Nihilists. When the Liberals begin to argue that, in their own interest, the Czar must divide his power with the people's representatives, the Nihilist organs already predict that before long Mr. Katkoff, in self-styled "saviour of his country," will be denouncing Slavophile radicalism as bitterly as he now denounces the Liberals and the Nihilists. The Golos has recently reminded the public that on a certain occasion Mr. Katkoff said: "The abyss of popular government is as dangerous as that of anarchy."

Mr. Michael Katkoff, the editor of the Moscow Vedomosti, is the undisputed head and soul of the Russophile party. He is undoubtedly the most original and interesting of all the Russian writers of the day. For the past thirty years Moscow and a considerable part of Russia has believed in what Mr. Katkoff was pleased to believe, and they have unhesitatingly endorsed whatever Mr. Katkoff has demanded. During the Polish insurrection, for instance, the Vedomosti cried out: "No quarter! Hang them!" And all Russia echoed, "Hang them!" The bold figures of the Nihilists stalked upon the stage. "No use of trying them," shouted Mr. Katkoff; "hang them." And the legal courts were suspended, and the Nihilists were hunted down and slaughtered like beasts.

The Liberals hinted that, in order to insure the personal safety of the Czar, it would be advisable to divide his power with the people. The Moscow sage clamored, "Down with the Liberals!" and the Liberals were driven out of power. Mr. Katkoff is the warmest partisan of strong government. "Perish everybody and everything else, but long live the Czar!" This is the motto of Russian Cato.

The liberal reforms of the late Czar gave a great deal of trouble to the Moscow oracle. He grumbled when the serfs were immoral, atheistic, rapacious, breeding revolutionists, demoralizing their own children, and resigned to apathy and rottenness. Such a certificate is given to us by the highest authorities. Then let it be so. And yet the same rotten society is called upon to eradicate sedition and to save the State. There is a too obvious contradiction. If Russian society is good for nothing, then of course it can do nothing for the Government. And if service is expected from it, then the certificate given to it is not correct. Again, there is a political axiom. Every country has the government which it deserves and is worth, for the government is a something standing out and above the public, but is part and parcel of it. And there is another axiom: Public life is directed and regulated by the government; therefore there may be a mutual influence, and it is a task for the historian to solve which influence was the better. They say the public is conscious. But it has intercepted the Government with the same disease, for who but the members of the Government can so well plunder the State property!

The Russians often use this saying: "Don't beat him, he is down." Yet they often violate it. Perhaps no Russian Minister was ever so much flattered, praised and extolled as Count Melikoff. But since his resignation even the very asses kick him. The Liberal organs, however, stoutly defend their favorite; they contend that he was indeed a light from the East; that he averted revolution, saved the throne, and averted a dreadful nightmare. On the other side, Mr. Katkoff pours forth the bitterest accusations against the resigned Armenian statesman. He says in his Vedomosti:

"The dictatorship of heart will be forever remembered. It never was sedition so bold, strong and dangerous as under the Dictator. Its revolutionists acted openly all over the country. They undermined the capital and deliberately killed the Czar. Sedition was in the palace, it was in the throne! They said, also, that he had reconciled the Czar with the people. That is a lie. He reconciled the Czar with Nihilism.

"Wait, Mr. Katkoff," said the Novoe Vremia; "nobody quarrelled with the Czar, but with his Government you have repeatedly quarrelled yourself. Did not you say that, though a loyal subject to the Czar, you did not care to be loyal to his Ministers? Did not you accuse the late Minister of Public Instruction for urging the students to riot? By such declarations you undermined the public confidence in the supreme power as much as the revolutionists do."

The programme of the new Ministry does not apparently find much cordial approval with the public. The Czar and Count Ignatieff have promised to find the truth and to establish it in the institutions granted by the late Czar. To this the Golos responds: "Truth! But how can you find it if it is not free? It is especially nauseous to be asked to speak in the newspapers. What we want is to get rid of the compromise with our conscience, which we have lived by for years, lest the real thing; if you grant us self-administration, permit us to govern ourselves, if you give us a representative body, if you want to provide for the peasantry, do it in reality."

The last question, the question of providing for the peasantry, is the likelihood to break down the present Ministry. What the peasants want is more land, and the Czar cannot afford it. There is no State land that would satisfy the peoples. The land they need belongs to private landowners, and the Czar cannot buy it, for the treasury is worse than empty; it has immense debts. And yet the land question is one of the most important questions of Russia. The Czar has touched upon it already; he cannot go back, and about frees the spectre of agrarian riot. The Moscow prophet is already raising the Government of the danger. He says: "The peasantry question is kept up by the persons who want to raise difficulties between the different classes. Our money is in the land question, and we hate that question. The arguments now brought up closely resemble those propounded by the heroes of Nihilism. The evil doers will not fail to utilize these questions officially raised for their own ends. Don't forget that our peasants still believe in the golden charter."

In justification of the gloomy prophecy of the Moscow sage, Nihilists of the faction of the Tchorny Peredel (the "Black Division") promise to the peasantry more than the golden charter; they hold that all the land must belong to those who till it and who water it with the sweat of their own brow.—N. LIFE IN CATCHINA PALACE.

How the Czar and His Family Enjoy Life—A Man no One Envies.

[From the London Times.]

BERLIN, June 15.—A Russian friend sends me the following striking picture of life of imprisonment into which recent events have thrown the Czar.

"The Emperor still breaks in sullen retirement in the castle of Gatchina. His Majesty has paid only two or three flying visits to the capital during the last month. On the last occasion he was to attend the funeral cortege of the late Prince Oldenburg to the sacred vault. And again a tumult takes place. When the Pedomosti assails the bureaucrats en masse, reproaching them with dishonesty and apathy, and urging them to imitate the revolutionists, so far as energy and discipline are concerned, the Nihilists cheer and cry out, "You are right, Mr. Katkoff!" Then the Moscow Jupiter is himself silenced and confused, and a score of journals of different factions at once jump up to revenge themselves; they sting him, bite him, and kick him.

Such a state of confusion has reigned for years, and regna now, all over the Czar's country, and especially in his two capitals. We find going on an unprecedented and furious denunciation, a journalistic war.

In his latest manifesto the Czar made it a reproach to Russian society that is, the ruling classes—that they lack faith, morality, justice, truth, and so on, and yet he called on them to "eradicate the hideous sedition." In his circular to the Governors, Gen. Ignatieff indulged in yet more severe blows at this same Russian society, and yet he finished with the same appeal. Such an inconsistency gave an opportunity to the Golos to administer to his Majesty and his first Minister a stinging rebuke.

The Russian people are accused of being station and took the direction toward the palace, he felt convinced that the eyes of the police were following him, but it was only when he was about to cross the bridge over the castle moat that he was actually stopped. Here the police officials were all officers. They ascertained his business and escorted him to the serving gate of the palace, the only one which is allowed to be approached. He at once found himself in the police office, surrounded by officers. His passport was taken, and his description, the time of day, and business, were all duly noted in a book, which the chief of police is supposed to examine every day. An officer was then sent to inform the official inquired for, while my friend was kept by the police. On the officer returning with a message that the official could be seen, my friend was escorted by a police officer down the long corridors to the rooms of the person he wished to see. All the way Cossack sentinels, with drawn swords, were tramping up and down. It cost really his imagination to see any end to the palace, however high he may be placed, is particularly overjoyed at present by the visits of his friends. My acquaintance was therefore ushered, for the love of heaven, to receive his conversation to the most commonplaces, and not to stay too long. When he got to the train on his return journey he felt heartily glad and fortunate, though he had confronted the man bold enough to brave them. But O'Reilly was of too coarse stuff to be deterred by danger from attempting to gain freedom for himself and opportunities for helping his country's cause. He had been one of the Fenians acted upon a large force of infantry, and on the open place in front of the palace were picketed the horse of about a squadron of cavalry. In the interior of the palace walls there dwell in the palace, and who are almost as rigorously searched. For example, a priest, employed in the service of the imperial chapel, was lately subjected to such a close inspection that even his cigarettes were not overlooked. A Cossack officer is stationed at each of the doors of the sleeping apartments of the Emperor, the Empress, and the heir apparent during the night. The last named complains continually of the restraint put upon his movements since his father's accession to the throne. He is not allowed to go out riding in the park, which particularly annoys him. None of the officers or court officials are allowed to be away from the palace more than two or three hours at a time, and are all obliged to be in before 9 o'clock in the evening. The court is always in mourning for Prince Oldenburg, who was a small port at the mouth of the Neva. Here four lighthips will be anchored, and no other vessels will be allowed to go near. The two yachts, Slavianka and Czarevna, still always be in readiness to convey the imperial family to Finland. Should they be accompanied on either side by a torpedo boat, manned with four marines.

Progress of the Irish Land Bill.

Our latest cablegrams inform us that Gladstone's famous Land Bill will reach the House of Lords before the end of the month. It will leave the House of Commons an emasculated, worthless thing. Instead of the amendments proposed by the Bishops of Ireland, and the National Convention being incorporated in the bill, some of the best features in it have been lopped off or rendered worthless by the Whig element of the House. Although it but little matters then what the reception may be in the Upper House, we are under the impression it will not be a welcome one. We believe now, as we have from the start, that the Lords will reject the bill. "Then comes the tug of war." The English Ministry, with Gladstone at their head, are prepared for the emergency. No great beneficent or needed reform was ever carried through Parliament without the ultimatum of the Tory element. Neither the Reform Bill nor the repeal of the Corn Laws, neither Catholic Emancipation nor the Abolition of Negro Slavery in the West Indies—was carried without the tooth-and-nail opposition of the Tories. They believed, or professed to believe, that England's greatness and England's glory would be extinguished the moment any of those measures became the law. Although those fossils of the past have been gathered to their fathers, it is not surprising that their sons should do-today, or their grandsons tomorrow, what they have done in former times. It is the very class which impeded the freedom of the slave in 1848 that oppose justice to the Irish tenant in 1881. In the former case, as in the latter, they talked of "the rights of property," "vested interests," and believed as firmly in the "sacredness of contract" by which a black blackguard on the coast of Africa sold to a white ruffian in a slave ship, hundreds of helpless, unarmed men and women. Now the descendants of these same land thieves talk glibly about the "sacredness of a contract" by which a starving peasant promises to yield to a rack-renting landlord whatever the rack-renter may desire. The slave had no other way out of being a party to his slavery but by suicide. The Irish farmer has had to be a party to his landlord's terms or go out on the roadside or into the poorhouse.

The Whig landowners will combine with the Tories in the House of Lords and kill the Land Bill outright. An appeal to the country will follow. There are many staunch Whigs in the House of Commons who several seats at the last general election through Gladstone's popularity. They will be cast overboard. Landlord interest in Ireland is as dead as a mackerel. In England and Scotland the principles of the Land League have made great strides, and the sympathies of the working classes—the mechanics, the laborers and the tenant-farmers—will count dead against the landlord at the ballot-box. A Radical Cabinet will be the result, and the Lords will be compelled to swallow a Land Bill so unsatisfactory to their hereditary stomachs, that the present one would seem like milk and honey compared to it.

The Patriots' Tomb.

It is proposed to build a vault in Glasnevin Cemetery, Dublin, to be called "the Patriots' Tomb," whereon to place the remains of McManus, O'Mahony, Rodkin, and other Irish martyrs. For this purpose a committee has been formed and subscriptions are solicited from the friends of Ireland in every part of the world. In their address to the Irish people, the committee say:

Twenty years have now almost elapsed since the remains of Terrence Bellew McManus were laid in Glasnevin Cemetery. An uninscribed and broken flag in the center of the plot is all that marks the grave. Here are laid also the remains of O'Mahony, McCarthy, and Reddin, all of whom died martyrs to the cause of Irish Nationality:

"For dearer the grave or the prison
Illumed by one patriot name,
Than the trophies of all who have risen
On liberty's ruins to fame."

The plot, although scantfully situated at the junction of two of the principal walks, is probably, the most unsightly spot in the cemetery. To remove this reproach, and to honor the dead patriots, a committee has been formed for the purpose of building a vault, to be beneficiarily called the "Patriots' Tomb."

Plans and specifications of the proposed building have been submitted and approved. The work to be executed will be of such strength and durability, both in the body of the vault and the elevated portion thereof, that any wealth of superstructure the Irish people may think proper to erect, now or at any future time, will have a strong foundation, and the whole surface of the top can be used as a base.

The Committee feel that in beginning this work, they are inaugurating step to build a monument worthy of the men who had sacrificed all that is dear to man—life and liberty—fighting not only to draw the attention of their patriotic countrymen to the foregoing, and that, with their usual generosity and promptitude, funds in abundance will be forthcoming to meet the necessary outlay.

All subscriptions shall be duly acknowledged in the press. Bank drafts, Postoffice orders, etc., should be made payable to the treasurers, and forwarded to the undersigned address.

A Bad Law for Society in General.

Ever since the Reformation there has been a constant contest in operation between the Catholic Church and the Civil Powers regarding the facility with which State laws and designing or dissatisfied people break the bands of matrimony and to marry as often as their whims and wantonness may suggest. The difficulties placed by the English common law in the way of divorce has been almost entirely removed in this country, so that it seems to be even easier to get divorced than to get married, and this is especially so in Pennsylvania, where no bounds whatever are put upon those who are ambitious enough to enter the married state, even against the wishes of parents, guardians, or public officials—a fact that may be easily surmised from the following summary of the law:

No publication of bans or previous local license seems to be required, notwithstanding the fact that the law of 1750 stands apparently unrepealed upon the statute-book of the commonwealth; proofs of the personal identity of the parties presenting themselves to be united in matrimony are not exacted, the consent of parents or guardians in the case of minors is notoriously dispensed with; no opportunity is given for protest or for the statement of impediments to the proposed union, nor is a public announcement of the marriage required, nor is any secondary evidence of the fact of the parties to the contract.

Commenting on the sad state of affairs engendered by this lax method of entering into the marriage contract, a city contemporary sensibly remarks that "an easy marriage law leads naturally to frequent divorces. Parties who approach the marriage state thoughtlessly are the most impatient of the restraints it imposes. A marriage law which enables an unprincipled man to impose upon the credulity of a woman, opens the way to evils one cannot calmly contemplate. Under the Pennsylvania law, a young man and a young woman may go privately by night to the house of a clergyman, who never saw either of them before, and be married without their parents or friends knowing anything about it. The woman may return to her home and live there, while meeting her husband there or at other places. When the time comes that she needs proof of her marriage, she is nearly at the mercy of the man she has married. If he is a true man and a true husband, there need be no difficulty, but if he happens to be a scoundrel, the woman is nearly helpless. She may establish the fact of her marriage, and she may not be able to do so. If she succeeds, she has only done what a correct marriage law should have done for her, and she shows to the world a reluctant in place of a willing husband. The degree of sacredness with which marriage is regarded is one of the best tests of the degree of enlightenment to which a community has attained. Without marriage there can be no family, and without family, society has no real basis. The world would become a mass of shifting figures, going and coming with only the restraint their own inclinations impose. It may be the province of the Church to preserve morality, but it is certainly the province of law to foster and protect the family relation."

These are the opinions of a vast majority of Protestants who see with regret the material into which society will be plunged unless something is done to bring back the Christian world to the true teaching of the Catholic Church on this highly important factor in preserving the morals of every community from the worst of all corruptions and the most dangerous scores of evil to society in general.

Religious Census of Ireland.

From the census recently taken of the religious persuasions of the Irish people, we learn that the Catholic Church and the several denominations are rated thus: Out of a total population of 5,159,849 there are 3,961,863 Catholics; 635,670 members of the Protestant Church of Ireland; 485,503 Presbyterians; 47,569 Methodists. The decrease in Catholics and Protestants was about equal in the ten years—4.8 per cent. The Presbyterian decrease was but half, or 2.4 per cent. The Methodists have increased 4,228, 9.7 per cent. Of the other population of the country, 76.6 are non-Catholics, 22.3 are Protestant Church of Ireland, 9.4 Presbyterians, and 0.9 Methodists; while the Baptists, Quakers, and other denominations make up between them 37,959 individuals. Of the total number of 485,503 Presbyterians in Ireland, 466,107 are in Ulster, and of these 190,749 are in the county Antrim.

Kalloch on Pixley.

In the course of his prelude last Sunday evening at Metropolitan Temple, Rev. I. S. Kalloch thus alluded to the notorious Pixley, the parasite who feeds upon "the Popish Irish" in order to gratify his malignant spleen:

"Why, a newspaper in this city, which makes pretensions to fairness and decency, and which frequently takes it upon itself to lecture the Irish Catholics, prints a lot of these epithets, spoke by name of Vice-President Arthur and ex-Senator Conkling and ex-President Grant, as men for whom 'penitentiaries' eternal scape.' It is true that the same thing has been said of the other by another, who characterized him as a coward, behind whom stalks the turnkey and before whom yawns the penitentiary; it is true that Colonel Barnes has christened him as an 'arrested development,' and that the general voice of the community confirms him as a political monstrosity, a moral freak and a disease of the next degree; but this is no reason why he should speak of General Grant as a candidate for the penitentiary. This constituted him one of the persons I am arraigning, and that is why such a wretched Ishmaelite, scandal-monger and blasphemer as Mr. Pixley and his Argonaut should not be patronized in any way by any man who wishes well for his city or his country. The treatment of public men by such characters reminds one of the Chinese manner who carries in the sleeve of his vest an idol, to which he burns perfumed paper and incense while the wind is propitious, but when he is benighted in a contrary wind sets in, he heats his idol with many stripes, that so they daily great men, turn to curse to them, ride in their carriages and smoke their cigars, when they out his Argonaut should not be patronized in any way by any man who wishes well for his city or his country. The treatment of public men by such characters reminds one of the Chinese manner who carries in the sleeve of his vest an idol, to which he burns perfumed paper and incense while the wind is propitious, but when he is benighted in a contrary wind sets in, he heats his idol with many stripes, that so they daily great men, turn to curse to them, ride in their carriages and smoke their cigars, when they out his Argonaut should only go for the penitentiary when they have no more use for them, or can make no more out of them."

Dr. Duggan on the Land League.

The patriotic efforts of the Irish Hierarchy in behalf of Ireland's regeneration from English misrule is awakening renewed efforts on behalf of the great mass of the Irish people to continue the present Land League agitation until justice is wrung from John Bull. Already Archbishop Croke of Cashel, and Dr. Nulty of Meath, have raised their voices on behalf of the Land League, and now Dr. Duggan, Bishop of Clonfert, has added his potential influence to the same glorious, constitutional struggle. During a recent visit which Bishop Duggan made to Ballinskill, he received a regular ovation from the people, and in an address which he subsequently delivered he told them that "for thirty years he had given an earnest support to all national movements meant to benefit the Irish tenantry, and today he was heart and soul with the people in their great national work of breaking down the existing system of land tenure. He advised his hearers not to place too much confidence in the promises of either of the great English parties, but to persevere in their agitation until they had won a full measure of justice. This they undoubtedly would win if they adhered firmly to the principles and policy of the Land League, and fought out the battle peacefully but manfully." With such words of encouragement it is not likely that the Irish people will fail to carry to a successful issue the fight in which they are now engaged.

Irish Land League Convention.

We publish, in the present issue a full report of the Irish Land League Convention, which has just concluded its session in this city, and we hope every reader of the MONITOR will peruse the report, as it will revive in each heart that throbs with hope for Ireland's freedom, fresh courage to continue in assisting the cause that if persevered in may ultimately lead to Ireland's redemption from the galling yoke of English tyranny. It will be gratifying news to distant readers to know that the delegates from the several Land League Branches throughout the State earned for themselves the highest encomiums for the harmony and union which marked the proceedings of the entire body. Each delegate seemed to cast aside all personal preferences and private opinions in order to merge all considerations into the common work for the general good of the great cause which called them together. This commendable action on the part of the delegates combined to make this Convention a success, which must be gratifying to every lover of the land of Erin.

Archbishop Purcell's Creditors.

The suit against the Catholic Church property of the Cincinnati Diocese, by the assignee of Archbishop Purcell, was commenced Tuesday, June 7th. The suit is against all property which is held in trust by the Archbishop, and includes churches, schoolhouses, hospitals, cemeteries, and such city and other property as has been given by benevolent persons for the use of the church, that has been held in trust by the Archbishop. The creditors, represented by the assignee, number about 5,000 and the claim against $4,000,000. The suit has been ten years in preparation. When called on Tuesday there were a great number of attorneys present representing the creditors and the many congregations and associations having property at stake. A verdict having been secured, the case will be taken to the Supreme Court at a special sitting, and a final decision secured. It is expected that the trial will continue about six weeks. The chief point at issue—and it is one that has never been decided in the courts—is whether property held in trust by a Bishop of the Church is liable for his debts. Canon law will be quoted in the case, but the degree of weight that will be given to it seems to be a matter of conjecture.

Attendance in London Protestant Churches.

On the 1st of May a census was taken of the number of people who attended services in all the churches of the city of London, the numbers of persons each church can accomodate, how the various congregations were made up, and the cost of administration. In one church the congregation numbered ten persons, in another nine, in another eight, in another seven, and in another two. Out of fifty-seven City churches only eleven had a congregation of over 100 persons, and in more than half of the churches there were not fifty of a congregation. There were 706 choristers, most of them hired, making a total congregation of 3,853, and the total income of the clergy who ministered to the total general congregation of 3,853 was £42,000. All of these old churches were built and endowed by Catholics, and long before Protestantism was heard of they were filled daily by their worshippers. The religion was abolished by law, and the churches and their endowments were handed over to the religion manufactured by Parliament. The churches are now empty, and the money of service only to a crowd of officials. Not surprising.

TOPICS OF THE TIMES.

—A postal card has been received at Washington for Guiteau, purporting to be from George Francis Train, which suggests the expediency of his pardon, because, as the writer coolly states, "the smashed Star-spangled Banner, and the star routes, immortalized Garfield, smothered Grant, Arthur, and Conkling, collapsed Depew, brought woodchuck over to the White House and contained a quarter of a million gift for the family of the President."

—A disciple of Bob Ingersoll in England proposes, under the Vagrant Act of 1824, to prosecute the clergy of the Established Church for pretending to a knowledge of future events, and under such pretence cheating and defrauding Her Majesty's subjects, inasmuch as all classes of the community pay money under pressure of an incorrect translation of the New Testament, in which the word presbyter is rendered in the sense of King James was garbled and untrue. This is a fresh phase in the rebellion over the revised version.

—Owing to the afflicted condition of his eyes and to his consequent inability to attend personally to all the affairs of the diocese, the Right Rev. Bishop Keane, has appointed the Very Rev. Augustine Van de Vyver his Vicar-General for the diocese of Richmond, conveying to him all the powers belonging to that office, by the disposition of the Holy Ghost Canons, and by the special provisions made for this country by the Holy See, and gives official notice of the same to all the members of the Reverend clergy of diocese.

CATHOLIC NEWS IN BRIEF.

—Attempts to burn the two Catholic Churches of St. Sauveur, Quebec, have been discovered and frustrated.

—Father Fulton, S. J., has been transferred from New York city to Washington, as successor to Georgetown College. Father Morrick, S. J., of Georgetown, assumes his place in charge of the church.

—Through the efforts of the Catholic Association (The Holy Childhood of Jesus) 450,000 pagan children in danger of death have been baptized, and 94,000 abandoned children have been placed in Orphanages during the year of 1880.

—It has recently been made public that the late Pope Pius IX., possessed in Ireland a personal estate valued at $800. His will, as contained in 11 different documents, was proved in London a fortnight since by the attorney for Cardinals Monaco, Simeoni, and Merry, when an estate under the amount was sworn to.

—Rev. Daniel F. Hayes, the pastor of St. Stephen's parish, Minneapolis, went with his brother to Corcoran, one of the missionary towns of his parish, on the 8th inst. At night they occupied the room usually reserved for them in the house of Mr. John Mahesse. The following morning, both were found dead, having been suffocated with gas from the lamp, which they had left burning all night.

A cable dispatch to the Freeman's Journal announces that the Pope has named Rev. A. J. Meyer, C. M., of St. John's College, Brooklyn, N. Y., Bishop in partibus infidelium and Administrator of the Diocese of Galveston. Father Meyer is affiliated with a division of the up-country clergy who have disagreed from residing his office for ten years back, and will not let him say his Mass except with gas.

A writer in the Sunday News says "I heard a gentleman acquaintance of Henry Ward Beecher tell a story about the latter recently. It was this: Mr. Beecher employs several female servants. They are all Catholics. He prefers them to servants of his own faith. He insists that they shall attend mass every Sunday and go to confession regularly once a month. Mrs. Beecher the servants idolize, speaking of her as one of the best and gentlest of women. The Plymouth pastor's excellent wife will attend house herself to order to allow her help to go to Mass on Sunday and holidays of obligation.

CLEVELAND, July 8.—Yesterday's Catholic Universe contains a lengthy and forcible pastoral by Bishop Gilmour, on the attempted assassination of the President. It begins: "Of all crimes, murder is the most terrible known to society; but when the life of a chief magistrate of a country is assailed, there is not only the malice of murder in the act, but also an attempt on authority which is of God. Kings and magistrates hold from God, and their power is from God, not from the people, except indirectly. Hence any attack upon a ruler is sacrilegious, as well as criminal. Our God-ordained authority is thus attacked in the person of the President."

Depopulation of Ireland.

An abstract of the Irish Census returns has been published. From it are gathered the following facts. The census shows a population of 5,159,849; there having been a decrease of 252,838 since 1871. This population is composed of 2,952,994 men, and 2,637,055 women. The decrease in population is common to all the counties except Antrim, Dublin, and Kerry. It was greater in Ulster than elsewhere; and is greatest of all in Monaghan. Dublin has increased by 12,891; Antrim by 19,156; and Kerry by 3,962. During the past ten years there have been 1,392,711 births, and 909,110 deaths; that is, 423,603 more births than deaths. The number of 622,696 have emigrated during the ten years. We find that there are only 451 Jews in Ireland—256 men, and 200 women.

Commenting on the decrease in population, the Times says: "The greatest decrease of population is in Ulster. It is evident that the small farmers who had the privilege of selling their tenant-right to the highest bidder in the open market have aided themselves of it largely during the last few years, and carried off the proceeds of "free sale" to the other side of the Atlantic, where they were led to believe they could employ a little capital to much greater advantage. The Pall Mall Gazette is of opinion that the sale of tenant-right makes it possible for the Ulster farmers to emigrate; and that when the sale of tenant-right is made possible throughout Ireland, there will be increased emigration. But, it is said, this means that the emigrants will carry away with them the sums that they have received for their tenant-rights; and this, again, means that Ireland will be depleted of so much more capital.

A unique assemblage of the Princes of the Church is anticipated in London during the approaching Jubilee. The Pontifical Secretary, Cardinal Jacobini, is to be the guest of the Archbishop of Westminster, and Cardinals Newman and Howard, are expected to visit the English metropolis at about the same time.

IRISH NATIONAL LAND LEAGUE.

First California Convention.

Full Report of the Proceedings, Resolutions, Etc., Etc.

On Tuesday morning last the first Convention held in this State of the Irish National Land League, convened at Irish-American Hall, which was profusely decorated with flags and flowers for the occasion; and from the flagstaff of the building floated the splendid emblem of united Ireland—orange, white and green. Two-thirds of the counties of the State were represented by 125 delegates, many of whom were ladies, and the assemblage may be justly pronounced one of which every son and daughter of Ireland might feel proud of.

D. J. Tuohy called the Convention to order and extended a cordial welcome to the ladies and gentlemen forming the assembly, who had sacrificed their time and money in advancing the interests of the Irish race.

Secretary Flanagan read the call for the Convention.

D. J. Tuohy and Thaddeus Flanagan were then elected respectively President and Secretary pro tem.

On motion of T. B. O'Brien, the chairman appointed a Committee on Credentials as follows: Messrs. Thaddeus Flanagan, D. J. Tuohy, T. B. O'Brien, Michael Davitt, the glorious founder of the League; and Ladies Mesdames Sweeney, Shealy, Thomas Brennan, Hughes, Dillon, and three fellow prisoners, now incarcerated in English jails, our sympathy, our admiration and our gratitude are due, and are hereby lovingly tendered.

Resolved, That the friends of Ireland, in every part of the world, who are practical evidence of their sympathy in her present gallant struggle, who are fighting her battles, who are obtaining redress, redemption, rare or politics may be; let now at last, the friends of Ireland present a united front, and the fields and deserts of the past are forgotten.

Resolved, That we uphold and maintain the Irish people in the assertion of their rights to the fruits of their political energy in the shape of forts and the help of Divine Providence, succeed in the above mentioned Resolution, Presidents of the United States as the greatest ruler on earth, "God help us."

Resolved, That the State Convention of the Irish National Land League of California hereby tender its earnest sympathy to the President and his family, and the care of that noble placed in the hands of the Executive Committee.

Mr. Thaddeus Flanagan calls Mrs. Dessey delivered the following address:

"I am exceedingly glad to meet you all here to-day. It is very fortunate for us to be and consult together; to interchange between ourselves our ideas, experiences and counsel; but it is gratifying to see a measure brought forward in California to strengthen those efforts which are to secure the true position of our people in Ireland. I regret to see so many of our sister or wives, who have come here to lend their feeble support, their brave, quiet counsel, helpful to each other; strong, I said, yet lovely. Women who hold the name of wife and mother—far nobler than the title of a queen. We are the keepers of the altar; they to protect the pure and distressed. Therefore, let

Resolved, That the women of the Irish Nationalist Land League of California, hereby pledge we will go on with the work in spite of our enemies, and we will do our part, and we will fill the quill of the Irish people to the solid of the Irish Land Bill, and we will all be here to the great president by Michael Davitt, and by the presidency of which he was consigned to the Irish Land Bill. Hurrah! Hurrah! Hurrah! for the free to be has indeed on every Irish bill. Hurrah! Hurrah! Hurrah! for the Irish Land Bill, let our tears and pure prayers, like incense, go up to the Throne of Grace, and our country's needs.

Mrs. Sullivan of Virginia City, Nev., Mrs. Cregan and Miss Putman of San Francisco, also addressed the Convention.

The Convention adjourned to 7 o'clock last evening.

Evening Session.

The Executive Council met at 5 o'clock to select a constitution and bylaws for the government of the Land League of California. These articles are also to serve as a guide to the many subordinate Land Leagues in the Commonwealth and work; but their adoption is not made imperative, but it is hoped they will adopt them for their own constitutions, if they prefer. The Council referred the matter to a committee of five, President Tuohy named Judge Cooney, Leonard, Belcher, Father Kenney and J. J. Tobin, who will meet this morning at 8 o'clock to adopt a code.

The Convention met at 8:30 o'clock P. M., and passed a resolution requesting Mr. Parnell to visit San Francisco at an early date. The following names were added to the Executive Committee: Mrs. McElroy, Sacramento; Miss Mary Donovan, Sumnerville; Miss McInerny, Merced; Mrs. Cregan, San Francisco.

It was resolved that the next meeting of the League be held at Oakland.

The Convention then passed a vote of thanks to all the distinguished clergymen in Ireland, without regard to creed, who had so nobly espoused the cause of the Land League. A vote of thanks was also given to the clergymen and the press of this city. After which the Convention adjourned sine die.

SANG IN LAST NIGHT.

Irish American Hall were the aspect of a magnificent banquet hall last evening when the delegates to the convention and their friends filled to the fair purpose of partaking of the choice edibles and fluids which were laden Boniface of the Columbia Hotel, had prepared for them, under the direction of the fair members of the League. At 7:30 the members and guests were seated at the tables, and the hours were spent in a real "feast of reason and flow of soul," wherein oratory, wit, poetry and music were mingled. The numerous toasts drew great credit not only for the gaiety which attended the banquet, but also for the speeches which their responses added to the occasion. At a late hour the guests departed, all well pleased, with the harmony which characterized the deliberations of one of the most important, as well as pleasant of the most successful Conventions ever assembled in this city.

Los Cos, Nevada; Miss M. A. Sullivan, Virginia City, Nev.

The Committee already appointed in this city to take charge of the Michael Davitt Testimonial Fund were instructed to receive the sum amounts already contributed into one envelope, and hold same subject to the order of the State Committee.

Mr. McCann offered resolutions, which were seconded with international fervor, to abolish the Secretary of State be requested to use all means consistent with international law to procure the immediate liberation of naturalized American citizens now incarcerated in English prisons, charged only with the crime of upholding the principles of American independence, which they have sworn to uphold.

Don't Breathe Through the Mouth.

Dr. Clinton Wagner delivered a lecture, a few evenings ago, before the New York County Medical Society, at the College of Physicians and surgeons, upon "Habitual Mouth-Breathing." It should attract general attention. He said that "breathing through the mouth often affects the constitution seriously, and a person who is habitually addicted to it can easily be distinguished by the silly and idiotic expression of his face. Indulgence in this habit affects the hearing, and the nose is apt to become permanently closed. It also produces chronic inflamation of the windpipe and the upper part of the throat, and it alters the character of a person's voice. It also causes asthma, curvature of the spine and what is known as pigeon-breast. The Indian mothers teach their children in infancy to breathe through the nose, and to this must be attributed partly their freedom from those diseases and their excellent health. A nose-breather," the speaker added, "never snores."

Why We Cough.

An italian investigator has been studying the cause of coughs, and has come to the conclusion that they are the result of a parasitic fungus in the passages—In severe cases the parasite multiplies and takes possession of the lung cells. Quinine is said to possess the power of stopping the micrococci growing and is therefore recommended as a remedy. The italian doctor has successfully used a powder composed of the chlorhydrate of quinine, one part, bicarbonate of soda, one part, gum arabic twenty parts. The soda is intended to dissolve the mucus, the gum arabic to increase the adherence of the powder on the bronchial passages. The blowing in of the powder should take place during a deep inspiration of the patient, so that it may penetrate the windpipe, the chief seat of microscopic fungus.

— When the weather is cold corn is the best food for promoting plumpness and warmth in horses. Oats constitute the best muscle-producing food, so that when very hard work is required of the animal a part of the feed should be oats.

— Reduce as far as you can the amount of feeding upon your farm, and put that which is necessary to keep in good substantial order. Fences at best are dead capital, a great and constantly recurring expense.

— A neglected, poorly-fed, stinted lamb never recovers, however well-fed afterward, so as to make as good and as large a sheep as it would had it had proper care early? Feed the ewes so that they can supply the lambs with plenty of milk.

The Man Who Got 'Em.

Three or four days ago a citizen of Hruson street called at the Gration ave. station house to say to the captain that he suspected a plot on the part of his wife to elope with a neighbor of his, who was not only a married man but the father of seven children.

"What makes you suspect such a plot?" asked the captain.

"Well, my wife has been kinder pickin' up her duds, asking about trains and trying to get me to go away on a visit."

"And about this neighbor?"

"Well, he and my wife are talking over the fence about half the time and throwing kisses at each other the other half. I don't care to raise a row over this thing, but I'd kinder like to stop 'em from running away."

"Well, you must take your own way to frustrate it, unless you go to the police justice. Be careful, however. Anger or jealousy may get you into trouble."

"Oh, I'll be careful," was the calm assurance, as the citizen went his way, to be heard of no more until yesterday evening. Then he called a passing patrolman into his house to ask further advice.

"You see, they had it all planned to elope," he explained.

"Yes."

"But I got 'em."

"How?"

He took the lamp and led the way to the woodshed. The neighbor, dressed in his Sunday suit, was tied up in one corner, and the recreant wife occupied an empty dry goods box in the other.

"Got 'em last night at 9 o'clock," said the husband, "and I've put in the whole day telling on what I think of such business. Guess I'd better let 'em off now, hadn't I?"

The officer thought so, and the neighbor was released, led to the door and the brass band said:

"Now you trot, and if ever you try to run away with my wife again I'll—I'll be hanged if I don't go over and tell your wife about it!"

He then turned to his wife, untied the cords, and said: "I guess you feel ashamed of this, and there ain't no need to say any more about it. I ain't very mad this time, but if you try it again there's no knowing what I may do."

"Well!" gasped the officer, as he drew a long breath.

Well, didn't I get 'em!" chuckled the husband, in proud delight. "I may look like a spring chicken, but I'm no fool and don't you forget it."

—One of the least flattering tributes ever paid to a rising young artist, had been paid to a Cincinnati dauber by a Western critic: "He possesses some merit as an artist, but it is hard to say whether it lies in landscape or marine painting—you cannot tell his sows from his ships, except when they have their tails exalted, when the absence of spars betrays their character. Even then they may be mistaken for schooners scudding under bare poles!"

—An erring husband, who had exhausted all explanations for late hours, and had no apology ready, recently slipped into the house about 1 o'clock very softly, denoted himself gently, and began rocking the cradle by the bedside, as if he had been awakened out of a sound sleep by infantile cries. He had rocked away for five minutes, when Mary Jane, who had silently observed the whole manœuvre, said, "Come to bed, you fool you! the baby ain't there."

—A fashionable lady was unexpectedly left without a servant. She undertook to make her husband a cup of coffee, but it took so long he asked what was the matter with the coffee. "I don't know," she said, bursting into tears, "I've boiled them 'at beans for a hu'l hour, an' they ain't no softer now than they was when I first put them in the pot."

SPANISH PILGRIMS IN ROME.

Address by the Holy Father.

THE VATICAN,—On the eve of Whit-Sunday the Holy Father accorded a farewell audience to the Right Rev. Dr. Murphy, Bishop of Maitland, who for some weeks past has been residing at the Irish College. The Bishop, at the end of his private interview with the Pope, introduced by Monsignor Father Curtan, a student of the Irish College, and dedicated for the occasion of Limerick. I have already mentioned that Mgr. Kirby, Bishop of Lita, had a private audience of his Holiness on the evening of his consecration, and I now add that on that occasion the Holy Father graciously presented him with a magnificent gold pectoral cross and a splendid copy of the Pontifical Romanum, Vatican edition.

On Tuesday, the 7th of June, the Spanish pilgrims from the diocese of Barcelona, with their Bishop, Mgr. Giuseppe Maria de Urquinaona y Bidot, were received in solemn audience in the Sala Ducale. The pilgrims, several hundreds in number, were chiefly from Barcelona, but were joined by some natives of the diocese of Valencia. Among them were several gentlemen, including Don Giovanni Salaros, the Marquis de Don, and Don Raymond de Valls. The pilgrims attended Mass on the morning of the 7th in the Church of Sta. Maria in Vallicella, and received Holy Communion from the hands of the Bishop of Barcelona. The Pope attended by his Majordomo and Master of the Chamber, several Cardinals and a number of prelates, entered the Sala Ducale at noon, and listened attentively to the address of the pilgrims, read in Spanish by the Bishop of Barcelona. His Holiness then delivered the following reply:—

"This is the second time that We have had the sweet consolation of beholding before Us the pilgrims from Spain, a consolation oftentimes received by Our glorious predecessor Pius IX., and notably on the occasion when he gave thanks unto heaven a years ago in great numbers in St. Peter's, and received the homage of their devotion and love.

"And truly it is an edifying and consoling spectacle to see increasing and spreading among Catholic nations the enthusiasm which leads them to the Rome of the Popes, to venerate in the Roman Pontiff the Successor of St. Peter and the Vicar of Jesus Christ, and here, at the tomb of the Prince of the Apostles, to seek strength for their faith, and force to keep them safe in the severe and arduous strife which they must sustain. Already numerous bands of pilgrims have come to Us this year from various parts of Italy. Pilgrims have arrived also from France and Germany; now they have come from Catholic Spain, and other pilgrimages are in preparation on the part of the Slav people, and other nationalities. This movement of all believers towards the centre of Catholicism attests the liveliness and activity of the faith everywhere, and at the same time exhibits in marvellous brightness before the eyes of all that beautiful prerogative of unity which distinguishes the Church, and gives a happy augury for the future to the human family itself. For in times so stormy as these, when love for God is both by perversity of doctrine and unrestraint of passions, and by the audacity of insane enterprises, the tranquillity of human society is greatly disturbed and its very foundation, no more portentous refuge can be found than the Church, which is the faithful custodian of the eternal principles of truth and justice, and which has for the assurance of her existence even to the consummation of the ages the infallible promises of her Divine Founder, whence it is that in spoken of the Church spread the nations turn to the Church and to the Supreme Authority which governs her, as to a luminous beacon, as to a secure harbor, as to a rock of salvation.

"Your Catholic Spain, as she was second to no nation in her devotedness to the Roman See and its Head, so was she second to none in participation of the most singular benefits which the Church loves to bestow upon the nations which are devoted to her. Even from the earliest ages of Christianity the faith was there in a magnificent Spain, brought to different parts of Spain, along with the faith were brought the inestimable blessings which flow from it. And when the Arian heresy strove to establish its seat in Spain, the anxious solicitudes of Our glorious and sainted predecessors Pelagius and Gregory the Great, united with the zeal of your Leander and other illustrious prelates, contributed to restore and maintain inviolate the faith. Thereafter no human force was able to wrest from Spain this precious treasure from which it derived virtue, greatness, and prosperity, and to the piety and holy courage of her Catholic monarchs the fierce power of the Moors themselves was compelled to yield.

"This traditional attachment to the Catholic faith and to the See of the Apostles continues to dwell in you also, my beloved children. And of this you gave a splendid proof during the past year, when the grand festivals in honor of Our Lady the Virgin of Pilar and of Monserrat, were celebrated with such extraordinary magnificence in Aragon and Catalonia. We took exceeding pleasure in hearing of the unusual concourse of pilgrims to those famous sanctuaries, and of the great piety they evinced, and We enjoyed also the attestations of homage and the tokens of lively joy with which you everywhere received Our representative, the Nuncio Apostolic of Madrid, when he appeared amongst you. We are grateful for this, and We preserve as a precious collection of those festivals the silver statue of Our Lady of Monserrat, which you sent to Us as a gift. And of your traditional attachment to the faith and to the Pontiff you have now given a new proof by your coming hither in pilgrimage to Rome to assemble around Us, to express, as you have just done, your sentiments of homage with affection, and showing by your acts how deeply you are moved by the dolorous and most difficult condition to which the Vicar of Jesus Christ has been, in this his own See, reduced.

"Continue, my beloved children, in this path; guard jealously the rich gifts of piety and faith with which Heaven has favored you, and prove yourselves ever to be worthy sons of your forefathers. As you are united in the same faith, be also united and concordant in action; resist the evil which impetuously advances and strives to drag down with it to ruin the family and society; combat in defence of sacred and eternal principles, and thus you may be certain of co-operating powerfully for the splendor and prosperity of your country.

"May you be strengthened for this purpose by the Apostolic Benediction, which from the bottom of Our heart, and in pledge of special affection, We impart to you Venerable Brother, to your clergy and faithful of Barcelona diocese, and those of the diocese (the Canaries) which you formerly governed, to all those who are here present, and to their families, and to all the children of Catholic Spain. Benedicite, Etc."

The offerings of Peter Pence on the part of Spanish pilgrims were numerous, and the sum of ninety thousand francs was presented from the diocese of Barcelona alone. On the 9th of June, the bishop of Barcelona and many of the pilgrims were admitted to the Pope's private Mass, and received Holy Communion from the hands of the Pontiff. On Wednesday, June 8, at 5 p. m., the German pilgrims who lately arrived in Rome from visiting the Holy Land, were received in audience by the Pope, and on the following morning were admitted to the private Mass of the Pontiff. Father Bernardino de Portogruaro, General of the Minor Observants, and several of the same Order were admitted to a special audience on the 9th of June. Canon Fraknoi, Secretary of the National Academy of Pest, had private audience on the 10th, and presented to the Holy Father 300 volumes, being all the publications of the Academy during fifty years from its foundation.

A Lord's Adventure at Midnight.

Lord Cahir preferred a charge of assault at Woolwich Police-court on Saturday June 11 against Mr. Henry Johnstone, School Board visitor, of The Grove, Nottingham, who appeared before Mr. Marsham on a summons.

His lordship, who is advanced in years, said that he for some time past lived in apartments at the defendant's house in Nottingham. On the afternoon of Friday, day week he went to Sidcup, leaving word at his lodging that he should be home late, as he was going to sup with a friend. At a quarter to one in the morning he returned and knocked at the door several times for a space of twenty minutes. He tried to open the window of the parlour with his pocket-knife, but could not succeed, and being convinced that there was a design to keep him out all night, he broke a pane of glass just above the catch of the window, opened it, and climbed in. The defendant and his son rushed downstairs, unlocked the door with a duplicate key, and burst into the room. Witness said, "It's me," but defendant advanced into the room armed with a heavy instrument, and struck at him with it. In defence, witness took up a poker and ordered defendant out of the room. Upon this defendant said, "Give me that poker," and not wishing to do any violence he gave it up, whereupon the man attacked him in a most savage and cowardly manner with the poker, and they struggled together until a stumble over a chair upset the defendant's balance, and then he held him down till some others of the household arrived on the scene. Afterwards, when quiet was apparently restored, the defendant rushed at him again, and struck him a violent blow on the face, making his nose bleed. His hat he produced, battered out of shape, and he would call two police-officers who would prove that he was covered with blood.

Police-sergeant Locke said he was called to the house by the defendant's son, and saw the defendant bleeding from a slight wound on the temple, which he said had been inflicted by Lord Cahir with a poker. His lordship was sitting in an easy chair armed with a broad knife, and there was a little blood upon his hat and the table cloth. His lordship was much excited, and used very strong language towards Mrs. Johnstone, whereupon witness advised him to go to bed, which at length he did.

The defendant called his son, Robert Johnstone, who said that he was awoke by the smashing of glass, and called his father. They went downstairs and opened the door, but could hear nothing. Lord Cahir, who was in the parlor at the time, keeping very quiet. They then saw the window broken, and unlocked the parlor door, when his lordship was seen sitting there in silence. Witness retired to the kitchen, but presently heard a noise and found his father down in one corner of the room, and Lord Cahir kicking him. He had the poker, and witness took it away from him.

Defendant made a long statement, in the course of which he said that he sat up for his lordship until twenty minutes past twelve, and had been in bed an hour and more when the smashing of glass awoke him. When he went into the parlor Lord Cahir admitted smashing the window, and said, "I will smash you too," at the same time attacking him with the poker. In the struggle which ensued he (defendant) was more hurt than his lordship, whose nose bled from passion, and whose hat was smashed by his sitting upon it himself. On the following day, when he went out, the door was shut against him, and he used threatening language, but went away and kept the keys.

Lord Cahir said the defendant threatened to thrash him if he did not surrender the keys, and in answer to the threat he took out his penknife and said, "If you attack me I will slit your jugular" (laughter). He was shut out of the house in the middle of his breakfast, and had left his property behind him.

Mr. Marsham said the police-sergeant would go with him to get his property. His opinion of the case was that the defendant, on hearing the noise of the broken window, had fancied there were burglars in the house, and that Lord Cahir was annoyed by his entering the room. Both were angry and excited, and a struggle took place, but fortunately there was not much harm done. He was not satisfied that the charge of assault had been make out, and must dismiss the case.

"Boycotting" in County Cork.

The Cork Herald on the 7th instant, has the following:—

Five men who were hired to tumble down the house of a tenant near Castleisland, have been boycotted by the people of the district. They can get no employment. One of them was engaged on a relief work a few days ago, but the other men struck against him, and he had to be discharged. It is stated that they are starving, and one of them was arrested yesterday morning for stealing a sack of flour from the Great Southern and Western Railway Co., at Killarney.

—Why is the situation of the North Pole like an illicit whiskey manufactory? Because it's a secret still.

A GREAT REVELATION.

Some Valuable Thoughts Concerning Human Happiness and Timely Suggestions About Securing it.

Synapsis of a Lecture Delivered by Dr Chas Cratz Before the Metropolitan Scientific Association.

The free and independent thought of this age accepts statements only where they are proven to be truth, while the development of mental power seems equally great in every other department of life. The valuable inventions of the day are counted by thousands. The increase of scientific study is universal. The spirit of inquiry in all fields is so marked as to cause

COMMENT ON EVERY MIND,

while people seem investigating and advancing in every direction which can help them morally, mentally or physically. This is specially true of the human body and everything which concerns it, and the truths which the people have found, even in the last fifty years, are simply marvelous. How really ignorant some cultured and supposedly scientific people were only a few years ago, is conspicuous at the present day, may be better understood from a few illustrative facts. A prominent writer prepared an elaborate essay to prove that steamships could never cross the Atlantic, and his pamphlet was issued just in time to be carried by the first steamer that went to England. People were believed that the heart was the seat of life and health. It is now known that the organ is only a pump, simply keeping in motion what other and more important organs of the body have created and transformed. It was once supposed that if a person felt a pain in the back, the liver was deranged; if a pain came in the lower chest, the lungs were affected and consumption was near; it is now known that a pain in the back indicates diseased kidneys, while trouble in the lower chest arise from a disordered liver and not imperfect lungs. A seven pain in the head was once thought to come from some partial derangement of the brain; it is now known that troubles in other parts of the body and away from the head, cause headaches and that only by removing the cause can the pain be cured. It is a matter of that Gen. Washington was bled to death. His last illness was slight, and caused principally by weariness. A physician was called who "bled him copiously." Strange to say, the patient became no better. Another doctor was called, who again took away a large amount of the vital fluid. Then in succession four physicians drew away the life of a great man who was intended by nature for an old age, and who prematurely died—murdered by malpractice—bled to death. That was the age of medical bleeding!

PRIVATE HISTORY

The speaker then emphatically described another period which cause upon the people, in which they assigned the origin of all diseases to the stomach, and after showing the falsity of this theory, and that the kidneys and liver were the causes of disease, and that many people are suffering from kidney and liver troubles to-day who do not know it, but who should know it and attend to them at once, he said:

"Let us look at this matter a little more closely. The human body is the most perfect and yet the most delicate of all created things. It is capable of the greatest results and it is liable to the greatest disorders. The slightest cause sometimes seem to throw its delicate machinery out of order while the most simple and common-sense care restores and keeps them in perfect condition. When it is remembered that the amount of happiness or misery are to be found in this world so dependent upon a perfect body, left to the care of every individual who does not not exercised? This is one of the most vital questions of life. People may avoid it for the present, but there is certain to come a time in every one's experience when it must be faced.

HUNT'S REMEDY is now offered for relating a little personal experience. In the year 1870 I found myself losing both in strength and health. I could assign no cause for the decline, but it continued, until finally I called to my aid two prominent physicians. After treating me for some time they decided I was suffering from Bright's disease of the Kidneys, and that they could do nothing more for me. At that time I was so weak I could not raise my head from the pillow and I

PAINTED REPEATEDLY.

My heart beat so rapidly it was with difficulty I could keep. My tongue was also badly coated, I could retain nothing upon my stomach, while the most intense pains in my back and bowels caused me to long for death as a relief. At this critical juncture that a physical longing which I felt (and which I now firmly believe was an inspiration) caused me to send for the leaves of a remedy I had once known in medical practice. After great difficulty I at last secured them and began their use in the form of tea. I soon noticed a lessening of the pain at once; I began to mend rapidly; in five weeks I was able to be about and in two months I became perfectly well, and have continued in this day. It was only natural that such a result would have caused me to find out something about it. Carefully examined, I was astonished to find that the leaves, which in the cause of physical order and disorder, happ and pain, and I found the kidneys which I lived to be the governors, whose motions regulate the whole system.

After describing at length the offices of the kidneys and liver, and their important part in life, the doctor went on to say

I had found out what a great truth, I was clearly the cause of my recovery. The simple vegetable leaf I had used was food and restorer to my well nigh exhausted kidneys and liver. I had come to them when their life was nearly gone and by its aid, a powerful influence was put purified, strengthened and restored them and saved me from death. Realizing the great benefit which a knowledge of this truth would give to the world, I began, in a modest way, to treat those afflicted, and in every case I found the same which I had experienced. Not only this but many, who were not conscious of any physical trouble but who, at my suggestion, began the use of the remedy which had saved my life, found their health steadily improving and their strength continually increasing. So universal, where used, was this true, that I determined the entire world should share in its results, and I therefore placed the formula for its preparation in the hands of Mr. H. H. Warner of Rochester, N. Y., a gentleman whom I had cured of a severe kidney disease, and who, by reason of his personal worth, high standing and literality in endowing the Astronomical Observatory and other public enterprises, has become known and popular to the entire country. This gentleman at once began the manufacture of the remedy on a most extensive scale, and to-day Warner's safe Kidney and Liver Cure, the sure remedy that saved my life, is known and used in all parts of the continent.

"I am aware a prejudice exists against proprietary medicines, and that such prejudice is too often well founded, but the value of a pure remedy is no less because it is a proprietary medicine. A justifiable prejudice exists against quack doctors, but is it right that this prejudice should extend towards all the doctors who are earnestly and intelligently trying to do their duty? Because Warner's safe Kidney and Liver Cure saved my life before it became a present duty has been made in ascertaining the true seat of health to be in the kidneys and liver, all scientists now admit, and I can but feel that the discoverer of such a theory should be entitled to, and which I have described to you, is destined to prove the greatest, best and most reliable friend to those who suffer and long for happiness, as well as to those who desire to keep the joys they now possess.

HUNT'S REMEDY

is now offered to the sick and suffering the result of my experience. Recognizing the causes which produce Bilious Headache, Dyspepsia, Sour Stomach, Constipation, Piles, Kidney Diseases, Diabetes, Gravel, Dropsy, Female Weakness, Disturbed Sleep, Loss of Appetite, Bright's Disease, and all Complaints of the Urinary Organs, Nervousness, Sleeplessness, Low Spirits, and General Debility, I feel it my duty, gratefully to those who have restored me to health, to place HUNT'S REMEDY in the hands of druggists everywhere, and to place the remedy within the reach of all who need it, I have put it in the form of a dry vegetable compound, so that every family can have it at their home. HUNT'S REMEDY is purely vegetable, and contains no alcohol or other intoxicating drugs. HUNT'S REMEDY may be placed in the hands of druggists in liquid form, or in powder form, for the above diseases, and has never been known to fail.

HUNT'S REMEDY will cure Bright's Disease, Diabetes, Gravel, Dropsy, Female Weakness, Disturbed Sleep, Loss of Appetite, Bright's Disease, and all Complaints of the Urinary Organs, Nervousness, Sleeplessness, Low Spirits, and General Debility, quickly follows the use of HUNT'S REMEDY. Those who have used HUNT'S REMEDY recommend it to their friends and neighbors. HUNT'S REMEDY is purely vegetable, and contains no alcohol or other intoxicating drugs. HUNT'S REMEDY may be placed in the hands of druggists in liquid form, or in powder form, for the above diseases, and has never been known to fail.

HUNT'S REMEDY will cure Bright's Disease, Diabetes, Gravel, Dropsy, Female Weakness, Disturbed Sleep, Loss of Appetite, Bright's Disease, and all Complaints of the Urinary Organs, Nervousness, Sleeplessness, Low Spirits, and General Debility, BISHOP McQUAID.

ADDRESS TO THE GRADUATES OF SEATON HALL COLLEGE.

Catholic Education and its Future Prospect.

We clip from the Rochester Catholic Union, the following address made by the Right Rev. Bishop McQuaid, of Rochester, at Seaton Hall, a week ago last Wednesday:

The Right Rev. Bishop McQuaid, of Rochester, the first President of the College, delivered the address to the graduates. He said: Ladies and gentlemen:—You will readily understand that on this day, when Seaton Hall closes her 25 years of good, prosperous and brilliant work, memories come back, and every heart is stirred to its depth. The memory of him now in Heaven, the first prelate of this diocese of Newark whose strong word, whose brave 'heart, abundant zeal, working for God's church, laid the foundation of this institution of learning. O, that he were here, that on his honored head naught rest the just crown of glory and honor for the work so nobly done. He is not here, but he looks down with gladness joy on this scene to-day. I see here magnificent structures, solidly and well built, I find an institution of learning most creditable to this diocese and to the Catholic Church of the United States. Catholic universities, colleges, academies cover the land. Where was found the mine of wealth that built these grand institutions? We read in the papers of institutions and Catholic receiving gifts of hundreds of thousands of dollars. I remember one Lawler established a Catholic College in Prairie du Chien, another layman, one in Omaha, another in Philadelphia. God bless them! Beyond these there, what has been done for higher Catholic education by the wealthy Catholic laity? Who can enter into the lives of all these bishops, priests, brothers, sisters and nuns, who have stepped forward, seeking no compensation in silver or gold, have given to religion and to God their time, and strength, ability to build up these colleges. The Catholic Church owes a debt of gratitude to them that never can be repaid. Our toil and sacrifices, sanctified and consecrated by religion, have dotted this country with these institutions.

After this preface the Bishop turned to address the graduates. For years, said he, you have been in the institution, under the care of your professors. To-day you close your college life and commence another life begins The years you spent here are as the years of the apprentice in developing mind and body to produce a becoming piece of work. You are looking forward to a career in which the mind more than the body will be called on. Be not carried away by those ridiculous notions so common in our land, that every American boy is born to be Governor or President, because one President was a rail splitter and another drove a mule on the canal. Let your ambition be to go into the world and do your duty as an American Catholic citizen, as best you can.

Steadiness and application will stand to you. You are not to enter society with the safeguards found in some countries; false traditions and civil enactments surround you here. We have no Catholic society worth talking of. New York city, with its half a million of Catholics, will not send forth young Catholics for any Catholic object. Call for the disciples of these priests, of these devoted brothers, whose life is dedicated to such work, and will they respond? The teachings of the college are upheld in some Catholic families. The laity two or three hundreds of the Catholic Union and the Xavier Unions in New York City are representation of the Catholic community. Young men, my heart bleeds for you. I know numbers of weeks, young men that went forth from colleges and now lie stranded and broken. Are the colleges at fault? No. The teachings were right and true, and many of our young men are found wrecks in life because they found the tide running against them. The right thought brought from college was killed by the gay butterfly society. He strong, be brave. Remember that, if true to these teachings received here, you will be made worthy of the Church, of a new society yet to be created. We are in our infancy. Better men will come after us, take up the work where we leave it, and the influence of Catholic education will be felt in America as the mercy of God coming down upon the land, hearts will be softened, minds will be cleared and stubborn will be brought to a knowledge of God's truth.

—Besides the petition against the Italian divorce bill presented to the Chamber by the permanent committee of the Catholic Congress of Italy—a petition which has received nearly 1,500,000 signatures—protests have been forwarded by the various dioceses of the country.

A Flourishing Organization.

At a meeting of the Board of Directory of the Catholic Mutual Benefical Association of the Archdiocese of San Francisco, held on July 4, 1881, reports were presented from the several officers, showing that the organization has extended in a substantial manner to 36 districts, embracing nearly the whole of California and portions of Oregon.

After carefully examining all books, vouchers, etc., of the Secretary and Treasurer, the Audit. ing Committee, consisting of Rev. J. B. McNally, John McLaughlin and Thomas O'Brien, reported every detail correct, receipts and disbursements accurately accounted for, and surplus deposited in Hibernia Bank. Amongst other proceedings, the following resolution was unanimously adopted.

Resolved, That the thanks of the Board be tendered to our retiring Treasurer, Thaddeus Flanagan, Esq., for the thorough, intelligent and efficient manner in which he performed the duties of his office for the past year, and for which he was so highly commended by the Auditing Committee.

The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: Rev. J. B. McNally, President; John McLaughlin, Vice-President; A. Visnte, Secretary; and Edward Gilson, Secretary.

PACIFIC COAST ITEMS.

—Ship-building is reported active in Humboldt Bay.

—The Lodi Review presents figures as to the comparative credits of grape-growing and wheat-raising, which are greatly in favor of the former.

—The Los Angeles papers are discussing the practicability of making a profitable disposition of the surplus of the orange crop by pressing it into wine.

—Wm. Blankenship, a young farmer who resides in French Camp, San Joaquin, fallen to $30,000, through the decease of an uncle in Arkansas.

—Wm. Ryan's team ran away near Salem, Or., on Monday, and he fell out and was dragged some distance, his head pounding the ground. His skull was broken, and he will probably die.

—The San Jose Herald points the rapid advance made in grape and fruit-growing and wine-making in the Santa Clara Valley, and predicts a very prosperous future for that region.

—That wild man of Unkerwaz turns out to be a poor sick German, who has been camping out in the mountains for his health. Since his capture he was found to be harmless, and he has been taken to the hospital, instead of the insane asylum.

—The demand for lumber has been great and the mills are busy. The Santa Rosa Republican brags of the size, quality and extent of the redwoods of Sonoma county. Humboldt and Mendocino counties are notable for the great extent of their redwood timber. There is a growing foreign demand for this lumber, and Humboldt county is doing a good business in it.

—The Eureka (Humboldt County) Standard learns of a singular phenomenon on a hill not far from that place. There is a seam in the ground as clear and defined as if it had been cut with a knife, and often explosions are heard which jar the ground like an earthquake. There is much coal oil and gas in the immediate vicinity of these tremors, but as yet nothing has been discovered that explains the volcanic action and earthquakes.

—John Call has near Healdsburg five acres of black adobe bottom land, planted with plum trees, and he tells the Enterprise that when in full bearing they will yield $1000 an acre. The Jackson Dispatch estimates the profit on growing, drying, and packing prunes in that county by an Italian firm at $720 an acre. Many prune trees have been set out in Fresno county.

—The Southern California papers report the honey crop very light. One writer says:

The land which produces nearly all of the best honey in California is not worth two cents an acre for anything else. San Diego with her timberless mountains covered for miles with sage was a dreary waste until Hardison set a few swarms of bees at their feet. Now this honey is known in almost every market in the world. He buys lumber by the cargo to carry on the business.

—George F. Fraser writes the Alta, from Atlanta, Georgia, as follows:

I see that there is an insect destroyer, a great cotton and banana enemy, also is showing its grove. I would be pleased if you or some of your friends would give a description of the insect and its mode of attack, stating how long the tree lives after the insect's first appearance on it. I think I have a remedy.

Some Sacramento may be able to give the information asked.

—A great deal of fruit is being shipped East from Sacramento. The amount is much larger than at this time last year. Among the shipments has been a car-load of assorted fruit, put up in the Hurst packing, a recently patented process. The Sacramento Republican says that the preservative agent is carbonized wheat bran, and that it fresh fruit is preserved from decay, that it can be shipped East by slow freight and sold at as fine demand as made for it, without being compelled to sacrifice it for fear of loss. The carload shipped goes to Philadelphia. It contains crapes, plums, peaches, apricots, etc., and goes at fast freight, though breadbut is the place to ship by slow freight, as it will come in cheaper over a fast freight, or from $1100 to $600 a car-load to New York. The fruit can be packed in this way and inexpensive manner, and preserved indefinitely and shipped anywhere, the business will develope wonderfully. Fresh peaches at Christmas and grapes at midsummer are very alluring; and Mr. Hetz says that they may be had by simply packing them in wheat bran reduced to charcoal. We shall see.

Slavin's California Fruit Salt

Is prepared from sound, ripe California Fruit, by a experienced analytical chemist, who has spent years in expert testing on its preparation. It is manufactured by a special process known only to the proprietor. This preparation is a safe, simple and efficient medicine for regulating the action of the stomach, liver and kidneys. It is particularly recommended for Dyspepsia, Indigestion, Headache, Heartburn, Acidity of the Stomach, Habitual Constipation, Nausea, Sea Sickness, Kidney and Liver Troubles, Over-indulgence either in eating or drinking, etc. As a purifier of the blood in all boisterous affections, it has no equal. It removes all eruptions from the skin, and has a cooling and invigorating effect upon the system. The Salt is entirely different from any other Fruit Salts or Effervescent Preparation. For sale by all druggists.

Have Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry

VOL. XXIV. SAN FRANCISCO, THURSDAY, JULY 21, 1881. NO. 41.

LATEST NEWS FROM IRELAND

The Land Court

DUBLIN, July 14.—The Land Court or Commission, as it is termed in the Land bill, is the tribunal to which the landlords and tenants may, if they choose, avoid the evils of the Purchase and allowance system and enable the tenants to buy their holdings by advances up to three quarters of the price and by purchasing estates and selling them to tenants.

NUMBERS OF THE LAND BILL.

New York, July 14.—A London cable gram to the Herald says: As the success or the fate of the Land bill turns altogether upon the Land Court, in which the entire machinery of the Act will be centred, great interest is felt in the probable composition of that tribunal. A court of landlords, or even liberal, would destroy public confidence in the bill, while, on the other hand, if the extraordinary powers created by the bill should be placed in the hands of men notorious for their leanings toward the popular side, the landlords would at once set themselves to defeat the measure, and the result might be fraught with peril, not only to the bill itself, but to the peace of the country. It is said on pretty good authority that the three members of the Court will be Lord Mortick, Mr. Justice Barry and Wm. Shaw, M. P. for County Cork. If this report be true, the choice of the Government will assure the efficient working of the measure and will command the confidence of land and tenant alike. Lord Mortick (best known to Americans as the twenty-fourth earl of Canala from 1861 to 1866) has had a large experience in dealing with the land question as one of the Irish Church Commission Fund Commissioners.

EMIGRATION STATISTICS.

LONDON, July 14.—In the course of the explanation of the Irish opposition in the Commons to the emigration clauses of the Land bill is that they work to promote the passage of the bill, and believe that there would be no opposition to the bill in the House of Commons.

THE GRANGE CASE.

The 12th passed off quietly in Ireland. There were no serious disturbances in Belfast and Lurgan, but the police were not called upon to interfere. The Orange Lodge at Lurgan, which has been held up by the Land League as a nuisance, was allowed to pass off without any disturbance. The Lodge at Grange, however, resolved to celebrate the anniversary of the battle of the Boyne, greatly to their credit, and not a disorder occurred

HYMN TO OUR LADY OF SORROWS.

Mother of Sorrows! hear the cry
My sad heart makes to day.
Oh! give me strength to conquer self,
For Christ's sweet sake, I pray;
That I may crush my own heart's pain,
Its weariness and woe,
To soothe and bless and save the care
That other hearts may know.

Mother of Sorrows! hear the cry
From aching hearts of woe,
From soulsick with weary toil oppressed,
Which thou alone can be
From souls whose wounds earth new can heal,
Nor earthly hearts can share.
Oh, Mother loved! oh, Mother blest,
List to thy children's prayer.

Beneath the shadow of the Cross,
Teach us with thee to stand,
In hours of darkness, doubt and loss,
Outstretch thy helpless hand;
Be Far to us with thy Son,
Teach us to say in every strife,
"God's Holy Will be done."

THE BALD BARRYS

OR

THE BLESSED THORN OF KILDINAN.

The breeze of the declining March day blew keenly, as I strode across the extensive fields towards the old burial-ground of Kildinan in the county Cork. On reaching the ancient church, I rested on the broken bank that enclosed the cemetery, to contemplate the scene before me, and pause upon the generations of men that have been impelled along the stream of time towards the voiceless ocean of eternity, since the day on which an altar was first erected on this desolate spot, in worship of the Deity. The most accurate observer would scarcely suppose that this enclosure had ever been a place of interment, save that certain little hillocks of two or three spans long, and defined by a rude stone, were scattered along its surface. To a fanciful imagination, these would seem to have been the graves of some pigmy nation, concerning which tradition had lost all remembrance. But the little sepulchres were the resting places of unfortunate babes that died in the birth, or but wake to a consciousness of life—utter the brief cry of pain, and sleep in death for ever. These unbaptized ones are never permitted to mingle with christian clay, and are always consigned to these distained cemeteries. With this exception, the old churchyard had long ceased to receive a human tenant, and its foundation could scarcely be traced beneath the rank grass. The father of the present proprietor of the land had planted the whole space with fir-trees, and these flourishing in the rich soil formed, by decomposition, a black mass of foliage beneath, have shot up to an unusual size, and furnish a proof that even in death man is not wholly useless, and that, when his life is ended, his carcass, may fertilize the soil impoverished by his greedy toil. In these all fire a colony of rooks had established their airy city, and while the young settlers were building new habitations, the old citizens of the grove were engaged in repairing the damage their homes had received from the storms of winter; and the shrill discordant voices of the sable multitude seemed to mock the repose of them that occupied the low and silent mansions beneath.

While indulging in these grave reflections, I saw a man approach by the path I laid tred. He was far advanced in the decline of life; his tall figure, which he supported with a long staff, was wrapped in a blue grey coat that folded close under a high stocture, and the woollen hat, susceptible of every impression, was drawn over his face, as if to screen it from the sharp blast that rushed athwart his way. He suddenly stopped, then fixed his glassy gaze upon a certain spot of the burial ground where stood a blasted and branchless whitethorn, that seemed to have partaken of the ruin of the ancient fabric, over whose grass-grown foundation it yet lingered. Then raising his eyes to heaven, he sank upon his knees, while his lips moved as if in the utterance of some fervid ejaculation. Surely, thought I, this old man's elevated devotion, at such a place and time, proceeds not solely from the ordinary motives that induce the penitent to pray—some circumstances, some tradition connected with this ancient place, has wrought his piety to this pitch of enthusiasm. Thus did my fancy conjecture at the moment, nor was I mistaken.

As the old man rose from his attitude of supplication, I approached and said, "My friend, I hope you will pardon this intrusion, for your sudden and impassioned devotion has greatly awakened my curiosity."

He immediately answered in the Irish tongue, "I was only begging mercy and pardon for the souls who in the close darkness of the prison-house cannot relieve themselves, and beseeching that heaven would cease to visit upon the children the guilt of their fathers. This spot brought to my memory an act of sacrilege which my forefathers perpetrated, and for which their descendants yet suffer; and I did not conceive at the moment that a living being behold me but God.

"Perhaps," he continued, "as you seem to be a stranger in these parts, you have not heard of the Bald Barrys, or the blessed Whitethorn of Kildinan. It is an old tradition, and you may be inclined to name it a legend of superstition; but yonder is the whitetb en, blasted and decayed from the contact of my ancestors' unholy hands, and here stands the last of their name, a homeless wanderer, with no other inheritance than this mark of the curse and crime of his race." So saying, he pulled off the old woollen hat, and exhibited his head perfectly smooth and guiltless of a single hair.

"That old heads should become bald, is no uncommon occurrence," I observed, "and I have seen younger heads as hairless as yours."

"My head," he returned, "from my birth to this moment, never knew a single hair, my father and grandfather endured the same privation, while my great-grandfather was deprived of his long and copious locks in one fearful moment. I shall tell you the story as we go along, if your course lies in the direction of this pathway."

As we proceeded he delivered the following legend.—The old man's phraseology was copious and energetic, qualities which I have vainly strived to infuse into the translation; for an alder pen would fail in our colder English of doing justice to the very spiritual language of the narrator.

"About a biting March has passed over the heads of men since Cubbert Harry lived at Lisnagar. He was of the true blood of the old Strongbow chiefs, who became sovereign princes in the land, and formed alliances with the ancient owners of the soil, renounced the Saxon connection and name. The noble family gloried in the title of M'Adam, and the colonel did not shame his descent. He kept open house for all comers, and every day an ox was killed and consumed at Lisnagar. All the gentlemen of the province thronged thither, hunting and hawking, and feasting and cosherring; while the hall was crowded with harpers and pipers, "carouphs" and "thackaughs," and "shanachies" and story-tellers, who came and went as they pleased, in constant succession. I myself," said the old man, sighing, "have seen a remnant of these good old times, but now they are vanished for ever, the genius of hospitality has retired from the chieftain's hall to the hovel on the moor, and the wanderer turns with a sigh from lofty groves and stately towers to the shelter of the peasant's shed!

"David Barry and his seven brothers lived with M'Adam, and were of his own name and race; and whether he enjoyed the sport of the chase, or took the diversion of shooting, or moved among the high and titled of the land, they always accompanied him, and formed a sort of body-guard, to share his sports or assert his quarrels. At that time, on the banks of the Brule, near the ruined tower of Shenacloch, lived a man named Edmund Barry. A thick and frizzy covert on his head had been for many years the haunt of a fox celebrated all over the south of Ireland for the extraordinary speed and prowess he exhibited in many attempts made to hunt him down. Many gallant and noble huntsmen sought the honor of bearing home his brush, but in vain; and it was a remarkable fact, that after tiring out both hounds and horses in the arduous pursuit, and, though his flight might extend over a considerable part of Munster, he invariably returned at night to his favorite covert. A treaty of peace, it would seem, had been tacitly instituted between Edmund Barry and the fox; a poultry for a series of years, whether they sought the banks of the Bride or the neighborhood of the barn door, never suffered by the dangerous vicinity; Reynard would mix with Harry's dogs and spend an hour of social intercourse with them, as familiarly as if he belonged to the same species; and Barry gave his wild crafty friend the same protection and licence that he permitted his own domestic curs. The fame of this strange union of interests was well known, and to this day the memory of Barry's "madness" survives in the traditions of the country.

One evening as M'Adam and his train returned from a long and unsuccessful chase of Edmund Barry's fox, they passed close by the ruins of the near church of Kildinan, this sacred spot, a whitethorn tree had stood, and its beauty and bloom were the theme of every tongue. The simple devotee who planted his cottage in its shade beneath its fully shade believed that the bands of guardian spirits pruned its luxuriance and developed its form of beauty; that dews from heaven were sprinkled by angel hands to produce its rich and beautiful blossoms; which the heart of the midnight watchers, and they who could have repeated the tale of battle, were appalled by this fearful calm. Obedience to the commands of McAdam could not steel their bosoms against the stings of remorse, and the ill-suppressed murmur rose against their sacrilegious chief. As the night advanced, impelled by a strange fear, they extended their round the mysterious tree. At length, one, the eldest and the bravest of the band, fell asleep. His short and fitful sleep of repose were disturbed by wild and confused dreams, but as his slumbers settled, these vague images passed away, and the following vision was presented to the sleeper's imagination.

He dreamt that as he was sweeping watch where he lay, by the blessed thorn of Kildinan, there stood before him a venerable man, his radiant features and shining raiment lighted all the space around, and pierced awful and fearful the surrounding darkness. His hand held a crozier his head was crowned with a towering mitre his white beard descended to the girdle that encircled his rich pontificals and he looked, in his embroidered "sandal shoon and gorgeous array, the mitred abbot of a monarchic monastery, which the unholy rage of the Saxon reformation had levelled in the dust. But the visage of the sainted man was fearfully severe in its expression, and the blazing mortal fell prostrate before the unearthly eye that sent its piercing regards to search his inmost soul.

"Wretch," said the shining apparition, in a voice of thunder, "raise thy head and hear thy doom, and that of thy sacrilegious brothers.

Barry did not raise his head in obedience to the terrific mandate, though his soul sank within him, before his dreadful voice and eye of terror.

"Because you," continued the holy man, "have violated the sanctity of the place consecrated to God, you and your race shall wander homeless vagabonds, and your devoted heads, as a sign and a warning to future times, shall abide the pelting of every storm, and the severity of every changing season, unprotected by the shelter, and that nature has bestowed upon all men, till your name and race be faded from off the earth.

At this scathful denunciation the terrified man falls prostrate to deprecate the fearful malediction, and he awakes with a cry of terror which alarms the listeners. As he proceeds to reveal the terrible vision which his sleeping eye beheld, the crash of thunder, the flash of lightning, and the sweep of the whirlwind, envelope them. At the day dawn, they are found senseless, at a considerable distance from the spot where they had lain the preceding night to guard the fatal tree. The thorn had blown while disappeared, and, strange to relate, the raven hair which clustered in long ringlets, that any wearer of the ancient locks might well have envied, no longer adorns their manly heads. The force which had struck the frenzy of human daring had tossed them, like the stubble on the field, had realized the dream of the sleeper, and hence the living proverb of the bald Barrys.

Such was the narrative of the last representative of the "Bald Barrys." I begveath it to the reader without note or comment. He of course will regard it according to his particular bias—will wonder how an imaginative people will attribute the downfall of families, or the entailment of hereditary disease, to the effect of supernatural intervention; or exclaim, as some very pious and moral teen have done, that

There are more things in heaven and earth. Horatio, . . .
Than are dreamt of in your philosophy.

Against Cardinal McCloskey.

NEW YORK, June 24.—Surrogate Calvin has rendered a decision to day refusing to admit to probate the will of Caroline F. Merrill, who died leaving an estate valued at $500,000. The will is dated May 2, 1871, and is witnessed by Cyrus W. Field and Benj. Cartwright. After bequeathing sums to relatives, she gives $50,000 to the New York Hospital, $50,000 to Cardinal McCloskey or his successor, and the residue of her estate to Bishop Bacon, of Maine, Moses Taylor and R. G. Dodge, were appointed executors. Bishop Bacon having died, she executed a codicil in Rome on Dec. 9, 1875, whereby she bequeaths the residue of her estate to Cardinal McCloskey, or should he die before her to Rev. Thos. S. Preston for charitable purposes. When the will was offered for probate in 1876 it was contested by George Merrill, a nephew and alleged adopted son, and by others next of kin, no nearer than he, putting in same the mental capacity and freedom from control of the decedent. Testimony was taken by a commission in Europe and in the West, and after 38 sessions were held the case was submitted in the summer of 1880. The surrogate finds that the will and codicil were executed by the decedent while laboring under an insane delusion as to the character and conduct of her nephew, Geo. Merrill. Had it been admitted Cardinal McCloskey would have received over $500,000.

A Voice from Australia.

At the Antipodes as well as in Ireland Catholic Bishops are found upholding the agitation of the Land League. The Sydney Freeman's Journal contains a report of a meeting of the Brisbane National Land League, at which the Most Rev. Dr O'Quinn made a long and ardent speech in promotion of the movement. Dr. O'Quinn, although suffering from illness, made a most hearty and eloquent exposition of the cause of the Land League, and most telling illustrated its necessity from his own experience of the treatment of Irish tenants. He said he was not a member of the League, but he watched these things as a Catholic Bishop to see that they were in accordance with the law of God and the law of the land. In his opinion Mr. Parnell was a greater hero than Sir Garnet Wolseley or Sir Frederick Roberts, or than any other public man with whose name he was accustomed in Europe.

Father Breen, an Irishman like the Bishop, read a statement showing that the work done by the branches of the League in Brisbane had a net result of nearly £1,000.

— Did you ever realize how things get in your way when you're in a hurry? A Boston woman told her husband that a runaway horse was going by. He jumped so quick he sprained his knee, and in his frantic haste fell over two chairs and skinned his shin, stepped on the dog, upset the table with books and drop-light on it, ran against his wife and hurt her, and got to the window just as they were stopping three or two blocks away, round the corner.

THE JESUITS.

THEIR WORK AS CIVILIZERS.

Sketch of the Paraguay "Reductions."

Evils that Followed their Suppression.

At the very time when Bacon wrote the "New Atlantis" and Campanella his "City of the Sun," the Spanish Jesuits were forming in South America a community wherein were reduced to practice the Utopian ideals of these two dreamy philosophers. The Jesuit missions in Paraguay—called by the French reductions, and by the Spaniards misiones—were established in 1608 and lasted until 1768. The story of their organization, methods and progress forms one of the most romantic as well as instructive chapters in the annals of civil government, for it dealt with a socialistic experiment unique in extent and duration.

THE RULE OF THE COMMONWEALTH OF JESUITS.

Lest we should be suspected of trimming facts to suit conclusions, we may say at the outset that the "Commonwealth of Loyola" constructed in Paraguay is held up as a pattern of good government and domestic happiness by such high authorities as Muratori and Montesquieu, while even Voltaire (a very enemy of the Jesuits) is frank enough to confess that it "seems in some respects the triumph of humanity." Many essays and treatises have been written on this profitable subject, and with few exceptions the writers are loud in their praise while averring that no similar system can be introduced where the materialistic civilization of modern times has taken root. The latest disquisition comes from the pen of a Protestant clergyman in a European magazine—Rev. M. Kauffman—and as he is not liable to be accused of any pro-Jesuitic bias, we propose to quote the substance of his review.

THE FIRST ARRANGEMENTS.

"It was towards the end of the 16th century," he says, "that the first settlements of 'Reductions' were organized in the fertile plains of Uruguay east from Paraguay, a sheltered position contracted by chains of mountains sufficiently high to preserve the settlers from incursions of unruly neighbors, while the salubrity of the soil and brightness of the atmosphere gave every promise that the spot selected for experiment would reward the pioneers with ultimate success. Here the missionaries collected the scattered tribes of native roaming in forests and living in caverns, strangers to the pleasures of home and the security and sweet enjoyments of civilized life. They changed their habits from the predatory to the peaceful state, and turned their attention from the chase to agricultural pursuits. They began by providing the necessary food and shelter, and subsequently introduced a few of the more European stuffs for clothing the natives. They opened an apothecary's shop with medicaments for the whole community, and a public library for the district, together with educational establishments to instruct their new converts in the principles of religion and the arts of life.

HOW THE MISSIONARIES GAINED THE NATIVES.

"They taught them the rudiments of a commercial system applied to inland traffic by encouraging native industry, and become the negotiators for transmitting products of manufacture for exportation, the Procurator-General of the Jesuits acting as the sole medium in all commercial transactions with the outer world. This was done professedly with a view to avoid the evils of the merchant system in Europe, and to exert a saving influence on morals and its tendency to social degeneracy. In the same way the Jesuits carefully preserved the natives from the temptations of competition among themselves by establishing a community of goods. They gained a powerful ascendency over the native mind, and by a careful and just distribution of necessaries and comforts of life, the result of common work, they secured their affection and confidence.

THE RAPID PROGRESS MADE.

"Their zealous anxiety for the temporal and spiritual welfare of the converts, and their frequent exhibition of self-denial, in carrying budgets of provisions to the sick, soon made them in general esteem. The area of their activity was soon extended, and the number of adherents increased, so that after fifty years of their landing on the coast of Brazil, they had gathered around them no less than 100,000 natives, spread over about thirty settlements. Each settlement had a town of simple but not unsightly mud houses, whitened and covered with tiles, and provided with verandas on either side. Each mission had its own church, generally built of stone, and magnificently ornamented. Two curates were attached to each, whose office was that of parochial minister as well as general organizer of the local economy, and thus the Jesuits became at once the teachers and magistrates of the community.

TREATMENT OF THE NATIVES FOR SELF-DEFENCE.

"To protect their followers from the incursions of the lawless settlers in the neighboring provinces of St. Paul, they trained them in the art of self-defence and fortifications, as they had taught them previously habits of industry. Romantic accounts of heroic defence and precipitous retreats of the settlers when attacked by overpowering numbers of these ruthless freebooters and marauders, called 'Mamelukes,' are related in the history of the Missions. They gave frequent opportunities to the ecclesiastical governors to distinguish themselves by a noble fearlessness in the midst of the danger, and a derided self-forgetfulness in their endeavor to save the commonwealth from the terror and scourge of powerful enemies and as a to enhance still more the love and reverence of the people for them. The zeal of the pastors increased the fervor and devotion of the people.

EFFECTS OF THE RELIGIOUS EXERCISES.

"The religious exercises forming part of their regular routine resembled, in a measure, those of the Moravians under similar conditions, if we take into account the difference of religious dogma and ceremonial usage in the two bodies. The following is a description by Muratori: 'Every morning, before dawn, the children go to church, taking their place there, girls on one side, boys on the other. There they recite prayers and creeds until the rising of the sun. Then follows the Mass, in which all the inhabitants must join, except in particular cases demanding dispensation. After this everybody goes to work. In the evening the children are catechized. Then the bell summons all the faithful to Vespers. Special services on Sundays and on other occasions preserve the religious tone of the people, and church discipline, strict though gentle, preserves the community from worldliness and conduct unworthy of the Christian profession. The sexes are kept apart in public places, and marriages are arranged not by mutual attachment, nor as in the case of the Moravians, by casting lots and leaving the decision to Heaven, but by ecclesiastical authority acting for the community. Still, the results were, upon the whole, satisfactory. Chastity, sobriety, and calm, peaceful enjoyment of life prevailed among the people of Paraguay. The cultivation of music and the dance at festivals, marital processions and tournaments, with prizes for the victors, provided innocent amusements. Religious pageants and special ceremonies served to satisfy the craving for novelty and sensuous enjoyment among the people, and to keep before their eyes symbols of higher ideals. A perfect system of organized charity to relieve the distressed, in their own community or strangers without it needing assistance, stimulating the virtue of self-denial, gave full play for the emotions of love and pity. Everything, in fact, we are told, is done to preserve an equal balance of mental and health of body, while the delicacies of morality and religion are obeyed without a murmur.

NOT FAR FROM SELF-SUPPORTING.

"Muratori calls Muratori a 'diligent and laborious writer, who appreciates the principles of the Catholic priest.'

"It has to be noted, however, that although the principle of fraternal union and devotion to the common good, in imitation of the simple simplicity of primitive Christianity, proved the role of life among the people of Paraguay, community of goods was more in the nature of a custom than a law, and therefore was not rigorously enforced. Every one had his own field and property, and could do what he pleased with it. In other words, because the entire community was bound together by the ties of kindness, and the spirit of Christ was strongly exhibited, the necessity of a compulsory law was not felt. Under new governors Paraguay went rapidly to decay, and her people to day have relapsed into the state of barbarism from which the Jesuits lifted them. In seeking to explain this marvellous result, Mr. Kauffman has recourse to the Scripture phrase, 'Ye are gods,' and, in a high-toned panegyric on the Jesuits, he says, 'The people of Paraguay for the most part were as children. In other words, because the gentle, fatherly guidance of the Jesuits had wrought out a marvellous experiment among a primitive people, Mr. Kauffman condemns the instructors for not bequeathing their own virtues, disinterestedness and administrative genius to the adventurers who dispossessed them.'

Of course we do not maintain that the system above described would be adapted to meet the social and political conditions of France or England or the United States to-day, but it is worthy of note that while Paraguay contained no millionaires, from 1608 to 1768, neither did it contain any paupers; while the banner floated over no bloody conquests on land or sea, its people were prosperous and contented. Such, too, is the testimony of Charlevoix, the historian of the United States etc., (Edition of 1825-26), who, after a careful survey of the country's condition, declares "If there were nothing in the Jesuit rule to excite emulation, yet the natives lived happily under it, attained considerable civilization, and relapsed rapidly into barbarism under the temporal and spiritual rule which replaced that of the Fathers."

"The German's are a frugal people, says an American writer after visiting the Berlin opera house. "As even as the opera was over, the man in front took out a bottle of cream from his pocket, and stopped up his ears to save the pops he had paid for.

A SUBSTITUTED CHILD.

A Waif Placed in the Arms of a Wealthy Brewer's Wife as Her Infant.

St Louis, June 26. A surprising revelation has been made here in connection with the litigation over the estate of Joseph Uhrig, a wealthy brewer who died in 1876, leaving a fortune worth over half a million dollars, which included Uhrig's Cave, a favorite resort for lager drinkers, of which class St. Louis is its German population, has many thousands. Joseph Uhrig left his property to his widow and two putative children, August Uhrig and Mrs Josephine Lademan. The former ran through most of his property and died in 1879. His widow, Josephine Uhrig, set up a claim last week to the whole of the estate, averring that she was the sole heir. In the hearing of this application it was developed that August Uhrig was not the wealthy brewer's son, but that when he was a day and a half old he was substituted for a child just born to Mrs. Joseph Uhrig, and that the deception was practiced in order to bring back to reason the brewer's wife, who had become delirious, and was unconscious of the death of her child at its birth. While Mrs. Uhrig was still delirious, although conscious enough to miss her child, Joseph Uhrig, accompanied by his sister, Mrs Mary Ann Kleinmann, and the Rev. Father Fisher, went to St. Vincent's Orphan Asylum, where they found a boy child a day and a half old, just the age of the one that died. On the representation of Father Fisher this child was surrendered to Mr. Uhrig, on his promise to adopt it and treat it in every respect, I gift, little of the cement from the Church of Knock, which he had blessed in water, and of the water I drank same, and more of it I applied to the wounds. The discharge ceased so much that I was at once filled with the desire of visiting the holy shrine of Knock. After Dr. Cubbert's orders I had another spint made—the first that was made for me having grown so short that I was obliged to leave it aside, and get this other, which is now hanging on the gable at Knock. Dr. Cubbert and his crutches made for me, together with the splint, and this was when I was during which time I was not able to sit up long enough to have my bed dressed. The way in which the Sisters (Charity, Hospital, Boston, Mass.) S. A. used to make my bed was thus:

EIGHTEEN MONTHS LYING IN BED.

"They would get a second bed beside mine, then slide me into it, and in this manner my bed was dressed for eighteen months, at the end of which time the doctors thought they would be able to get me up with the aid of a splint, crutches, and high heel. Some days I would be able to sit up on the rocking chair while my bed was being made, other days I would be able to sit up for an hour or two, while on other days I would grow so exhausted that I would require to be put into bed immediately. In this condition I continued, until one day in April, when the doctor came to see me, and, after examining my wounds, I got a severe fall, and from that day I was obliged

TO KEEP TO MY BED CONTINUALLY,

having to put up with the same inconvenience in getting my bed dressed as I have before described. I can find words to describe the inconceivable pain I underwent, and to alleviate it the good sisters would give me a powder every night, as also to make me sleep, and their general kindness to me for two years and a half in their hospital I can never, never forget. Then and Charity Hospital behold me on the 17th July, 1880, on route for Knock Church, with my crutches dismissed by testimony, put in a carriage, and, by the time to the S. S. Samaria, and comfortably placed in bed aboard the steamer by dear Sister Valentine, the extension being still on my leg, as before, I felt the hospital. One of the Sisters, Mary Michael, used to say to me in the hospital—'Jane, how could you get into or out of the steamers or trains?' I thought it would be impossible for me to get to Knock, and myself had no idea how I would get there, only by trusting in God and our dear Lady of Knock, to bring me safe to the holy shrine. My sister accompanied me, and, thank God, we arrived safe at Knock on the 3rd of August. So prostrated was I, that I had to be left in the church

ONE CONSECUTIVE DAYS AND NIGHTS,

"On the third night of my stay in the church I took the bandages and splint off my leg, and was able to get up from my bed without any assistance. On the same night I stood up five minutes, the next night I remained standing ten minutes, and walked a few steps, and then laid down again, whereupon all that were in the church joined me in saying the Rosary in honor of our Blessed Lady for the boon she had obtained for me. All at once the picture of the Sacred Heart that is beside the high altar was covered over with beautiful stars, and they remained for about ten minutes, when they moved in the direction of the high altar, where they remained for some time, and then disappeared. I felt very happy then, for I knew that our Blessed Mother had received my prayers, and there and then the greater part of the pain ceased.

"On the 14th of August I got a great change. Two or three people saw the Blessed Virgin standing beside me, but could not see her, and I knew I was not worthy, but still I felt that she was present and at the same time a great relief came over my diseased limb. From that time I implored every night our Lady of Knock to intercede for my full cure, and now I bless her to our dear Lord and His Holy Mother, I can walk very well without any assistance. When I go out I generally use my umbrella, but at no other time, and I can now, thank God, walk very well indeed. I wish, whilst during the two previous years I would be in no other attitude than on my back.

"This, Very Rev. and dear Father, is as correct and complete a statement as I can possibly give. The best doctors in the city, including Drs. Cubbert, Bradford, Somerville, and Dalman, could not pronounce whether I would get well or not, their only opinion was that I kept up my spirits well, notwithstanding my sufferings. And when I was leaving Boston, a great number of friends came to see me, and thought they would never see me alive again.

"You are aware, dear Father, that the splint crutches, and boot, six inches high, all hang on the gable of the church, where I promised to place them, and as the splint is of steel, it may may remain there for years.

"My desire to be as explicit as possible is the only excuse, dear Father, that I can offer for the length of this letter. And should it meet the eyes of other sufferers, I pray it may induce them to look with confidence to our dear Lady of Knock. I am, Very Rev. Father, yours most obediently,

"JANE O'NEIL.

Father Burke in Drogheda.

Go and Preach to All Nations.

On Sunday, the 6th inst., the Dominicans celebrated a new mission for the people of Drogheda, which was conducted by the order in this city, and which was attended with great success. The mission was conducted under the direction of the Dominican fathers. A meeting took place that been added to the past religious history of Drogheda. The present Dominican Father Burke, was announced to speak, and a very large congregation assembled. The blessing and laying of the foundation stone of the new convent was then proceeded with. The ceremony commenced at 12 o'clock.

Father Burke, O.P. ascended the altar steps to preach the sermon for the occasion. The reverend gentleman said that they were assembled there that day to help the Dominican Fathers in Drogheda to lay the foundation stone of their new convent in presence with prayer and blessing. They were there to repeat an historical work which took place many years ago in Drogheda, and to assist in laying down a generous contribution on the Holy Feast of Pentecost, when the Church of God commemorated the descent of the Holy Ghost upon the Apostles. The work of the redemption was consummated by the resurrection of our Lord from the dead, but the great work would not have brought it its moral and teachings unless it had been followed by some mission and brought home to every man and child.

THE GREAT WORK OF JESUS

for the work to be accomplished in which they were engaged. In its significance the day was the real apology for the laying of the foundation stone, and for the existence of the religious orders in the Catholic church. When the Apostles were in Jerusalem they called the faithful around them, and said, the work in which they are engaged has a significance for its accomplishment. On Pentecost Day, when God was about to leave the Apostles, the change He gave them was "go, and Preach to all Nations." "For I have raised you up to be the witnesses of My glory, and of My Church. Your mission is not only for this people and that go abroad until every nation becomes acquainted with the grace of God, etc., therefore, preach ye the Gospel to all the creatures." He told the Apostles to wait for the Comforter. How did he come? like thing fire.

IN THE SHAPE OF TONGUES.

At the same time there were men speaking various languages, from the wild deserts of Arabia to the Chinese language of Greece. When the hitherto illiterate Apostles went forth, the Arab heard from the language of the desert, as did the Persian the Indian, the language of his country, so did the Greek in his classic language and the Latin, which God decided should be the future language of His Universal Church. They came to all nations. To establish an apostolic Church was the mission of the illustrious twelve, prepared by God, to suffer, and to die in every land for the Faith of Christ. There was an important law which the Apostles established—namely, the pastoral care and the cure of souls. The care of souls was prescribed for certain territories and districts beyond which the pastor was not to enter. His pastoral office was the care of a certain number of souls. The Church alone not permit him to go beyond a certain limit and unrestricted, the religious orders go out into the souls of the earth, into every land, to be as witnesses of the faith of Jesus Christ and His laws. Up to 700 years ago they had the pastoral office and the religious orders, confining themselves strictly to their rules. The latter continued themselves to their monasteries. Rarely did the Christians or others come out of their monasteries, but they always preached the Gospel of Christ crucified to the people. Afterwards when the people severed in their allegiance when more countries and new peoples were discovered—then Almighty God raised up the religious orders to preach His word. In the thirteenth century the religious orders sprang up in numbers. The children of St. Augustine came forth as apostles, and spread themselves through the world. St. Francis of Assisium sent his disciples in thousands. St. Dominic sent his sons out, and thus infused a new Pentecost vibrating through the hearts of the nations. Then went forth from the cloister armies of martyrs. The brown Tartar was arrested in his onward march of devastation by the children of Dominic, of Francis, and Augustine, who spoke to him of the Cross of Christ and the future rewards or punishments to come in the land beyond the tomb. They did so only to wear the martyr's crown.

UNFETTERED BY THE CARE OF SOULS,

IN ORDER THAT THE MISSIONARIES

had this great glory. He claimed for his own order one special claim in connection with the history of this day the Seven Gifts of the Holy Ghost. These great, Heaven-sent gifts were so well amply exemplified in his order. The Church of God honored his order by calling and allying it the order of fruit. The Pontiff of the day gave it the title of Order of Preachers. The great Doctor St. Thomas of Aquin St. Antoninus of Florence were great examples of the gift of wisdom. The preacher then gave numerous examples of illustrious saints of the order pre-eminently distinguished for the spirit of love was the author of the gifts of the Holy Ghost. Referring to the ceremony of the day, the preacher said that the work of that day was a new thing, but an old one renewed. In the laying down of the foundation stone of the new Dominican convent of St. Mary Magdalene, it was like a resurrection. St. Augustine said that "in that Christ died He showed that He was man, and in that he rose from the dead He showed that He was God." Seven hundred years ago the Dominican Fathers of that day spoke of these very same after them, and the foundation stone of the Dominican Convent of St. Mary Magdalene in Drogheda was laid.

THE DOMINICANS WAS THEN

and from his ministry in Home he saw the foundation stone good work. Their work was spiritual, specially among the Dominicans and Augustinian orders. Dominic had for 700 years lived among the people, and, like the Dominicans in Germany, sharing in their sorrows and joys, promoting their welfare, and defending them from the oppressor, the feudal tyrant and persecution cause, and the friars fled from, and rather than abandon their people the friars from the Dominican Order the streets of this town of Drogheda ran red with the blood of the Franciscans, Dominicans, and Augustinians. With these title-deeds, with such claims as those on the Catholic people, the Dominican Fathers asked them to go, and to stand by which to live, to labor, and to study among the people whom they knew, and for whom they struggled with, and with whom they died.

WHEN RELIGION SEEMED DEAD

when there was not an altar in Drogheda, not a church to be seen, and a Catholic dare not show his face—and when the Puritan, with blood-stained sword, rode on his war-horse through the silent streets blowing with the corpses of the slain—when every hope was dead, and every heart seemed bleeding and dying—the Church of God was relieved and mostly was to be turned in the grave. But the blessed Saviour was not yet satisfied, that He would let the Church in her persecution and danger, and make her triumphant. And so it was again, as in the olden time, they had in Drogheda the children of St. Dominic, of St. Francis, and St. Augustine in stately church. The Dominican Church again reared aloft its spires—its lofty towers. Every morning the shadows of the Cross was cast upon the tallest river, which was borne along on its bosom to commingle with the ocean. The Dominicans were appointed to the generous sympathies of Catholic Drogheda, and for every help and and they gave every drop of blood they had, and for every blessing—blessings on them and on their order. The only ambition of the Dominican Fathers was to live with the people of them, and God. He called on them, in the hour of Dominican martyrs whose bones were resting in the Irish soil, to build a new church for the poverty-stricken sons of St. Dominic, who could not offer them their prayers, their aspirations, and their love. Dublin Nation.

WENDELL PHILLIPS ON IRELAND.

From His Speech Before the Phi Beta Kappa Society.

One of the greatest speeches of the great Orator was so delivered recently before the centennial assembly of the Phi Beta Kappa Society at Harvard College. It was the Society's centennial celebration, by the most learned body of men in the country. We have for its orator the man of Greek tongue and Greek soul, and Greek principles. This speech of Wendell Phillips will be read by generations to come, and will be a generation honor. It may be far ahead of the prevailing sentiment of his own time, but posterity minds have no choice, but to accept it. Here is the conclusion of the speech

Ireland is another touchstone which reveals to us how we have gone astray in our democratic trappings while, as we thought, we have gone to seed in Tory distrust of the masses. Ireland is the oldest, the oldest born of democratic institutions, the oldest to the oppressed, and careless of the loss, every such moment seemed to be lost in keeping public thought clear, keen and active, and principles which are the essence of our civilization, and work of all education is republican.

Sydney Smith said "The moment Ireland is mentioned, the English seem to lose all sense, and to act with the brutality of tyrants and the fatuity of idiots." and Byron called England a nation with Ireland "the union of the shark with its prey." Burke's compilation from a survey of 500 years of English history, says "Truly by making the ruling few omnipotent, the oppressed, many obtain a particle of relief. Edmund Burke—Burke, the mighty figure in the parliamentary history of the last hundred years greater than Cicero in the Senate and almost Plato in the ideal—Burke arrived a century ago. "Ireland has learned at last that justice is to be had from England only at the sword's point." And a century later, or near, Gladstone himself proclaimed in a three addresses to Scotland "Ring, I never concedes anything to Ireland except when moved to do only fear." When we remember these utterances, we ought to clap our hands at every fresh Irish victory, and raise a parent green stylus in awareness that it is only at the sound of the cannon's roar that rattled against the Old State House on the 4th of March, 1776, and of the war whoop that made the tiny spire of the Old South tremble when Boston rioters emptied the three India tea ships into the sea, whose evidence of living force and vitality, and in the vortex, and a sign that the day of deliverance draws each hour nearer Cease cringing endless prayers and sighs on the men who made North's Boston port with Ireland's Irish port leading journal seeds daily over the water wishes for the success of Gladstone's copy of the bill for Ireland.

If all rightful government rests on consent—if as the French say, you "can do almost anything with a bayonet underneath it," be at least consistent, and denounce the man who secures Ireland with regiments to hold up a phantasm which will in twenty months, he has confessed, rest wholly upon fear.

WONDERS OF KNOCK.

AN EXTRAORDINARY CASE.

A Boston Lady Tells the Story of her Wonderful Cure.

"VERY REV. AND DEAR FATHER—It is with great pleasure I write you this statement of the great cure which has been effected in me at Knock through the intercession of our dear Lady, St. Joseph, and St. John.

"I was born in the county Antrim and went to America, to my sister, about four years ago, and was there but eight months when I was first taken ill. The first symptoms of the disease originated in my sleep. I awoke one night suffering from great pain in the limb in my hip, at another in my ankle. Dr. Somerville treated me for three months before he knew what was the matter and ultimately Dr. Patman pronounced it hip disease. I was then placed in bed and a 7lb. weight of extension put on my foot. This was on and off for one year and a half, which but had to lie on my back during that time. At the end of that period a great success made its appearance on my leg, since in the surgeons performed an operation. For one year it continued to discharge, and then another abscess formed beside the first, and this second one discharged for nearly two years. I got little of the cement from the Church of Knock, which I used in the water, and of the water I drank same, and more of it I applied to the wounds. The discharge ceased so much that I was at once filled with the desire of visiting the holy shrine of Knock. HYMN TO OUR LADY OF SORROWS.

I NEVER WAS ABLE TO STAND ON,

Mother of Sorrows! hear the cry
My sad heart makes to-day
Oh! give me strength to conquer self,
For Christ's sweet sake, I pray
That I may crush my own heart's pulse,
Its weariness and woe,
To soothe and bless and ease the care
That other hearts may know.

Mother of Sorrows! hear the cry
From aching hearts of woe,
From souls with weary toil oppressed,
Which then alone can know
From souls whose wounds earth never can heal,
Nor earthly hearts can share,
Oh, Mother lend! oh, Mother lent,
List to thy children's prayer.

Beneath the shadow of the Cross,
Teach us with thee to stand,
In hours of darkness, doubt and sorrow,
Outstretch thy helping hand;
Be ever to us a mother kind,
Plead for us with thy Son,
Teach us to say in every strife,
"God's Holy Will be done."

THE BALD BARRYS

OR

THE BLESSED THORN OF KILDINAN.

"The breeze of the declining March day blew keenly, as I strode across the extensive fields beyond the old burial-ground of Kildinan in the county of Cork. On reaching an ancient church, I rested on the broken bank that encircled the cemetery, to contemplate the scene before me, and pause upon the generations of men that have been impelled along the stream of time towards the voiceless ocean of eternity, since the day on which an altar was first erected on this desolate spot, in worship of the Deity. The most accurate observer would scarcely suppose that this enclosure had ever been a place of interment, save that certain little hillocks of two of three spans long, and defined by a rude stone, were scattered along its surface. To a fanciful imagination these would seem to have been the graves of some pigmy nation, concerning which tradition had lost all remembrance. But the little sepulchres were the resting places of unfortunate babes that die in the birth, or but wake to a consciousness of life—utter the brief cry of pain, and sleep in death for ever. These unbaptized ones are never permitted to mingle with christian clay, and are always consigned to these disused cemetries. With this exception, the old churchyard had long ceased to receive a human tenant, and its foundation could scarcely be traced beneath the rank grass. The father of the present proprietor of the land had plunged the whole space with fir-trees, and these flourishing in the rich soil formed by decomposed human bodies for many a foot beneath, have shot up to an unusual size, and furnish a proof that even in death man is not wholly useless, and that, when his labor is ended, his carcass, may fertilize the soil impoverished by his greedy toil. In these tall firs a colony of rooks had established their aery, and while the young settlers were building new habitations, the old citizens of the grove were engaged in repairing the damage their homes had received from the storms of winter; and the shrill discordant voices of the sable multitude seemed to mock the repose of them that occupied the low and silent mansions beneath.

While indulging in these grave reflections, I saw a man approach by the path I lately trod. He was far advanced in the decline of life; his tall figure, which he supported with a long staff, was wrapped in a blue-grey coat that folded close under a hair vesture, and the woollen hat, susceptible of every impression, was drawn over his face, as if to screen it from the sharp blast that rushed athwart his way. He suddenly stopped, then fixed his glance upon a certain spot of the burial grounds where stood a blasted and branchless whitethorn, that seemed to have partaken of the ruin of the ancient fabric, over whose grass-grown foundation it yet lingered. Then raising his eyes to heaven, he sank upon his knees, while his lips moved as if in the utterance of some fervid ejaculation. Surely, thought I, this old man's elevated devotion, at such a place and time, proceeds not solely from the ordinary motives that induce the penitent to pray—some circumstances, some tradition connected with this ancient place, has wrought his piety to this pitch of enthusiasm. Thus did my fancy conjecture at the moment, nor was I mistaken.

As the old man rose from his attitude of supplication, I approached and said, "My friend, I hope you will pardon this intrusion, for your sudden and impassioned devotion has greatly awakened my curiosity."

He immediately answered in the Irish tongue, "I was only begging mercy and pardon for the souls who in the close darkness of the prison-house cannot relieve themselves, and beseeching that heaven would cease to visit upon the children the guilt of their fathers. This spot brought to my memory an act of sacrilege which my forefathers perpetrated, and for which their descendants yet suffer, and I did not receive at the moment that a living being beheld me but God.

"Perhaps," he continued, "as you seem to be a stranger in these parts, you have not heard of the Bald Barrys, or the blessed Whitethorn of Kildinan. It is an old tradition, and you may be inclined to name it a legend of superstition; but ponder in the whitethorn, blasted and decayed from the contact of my ancestors' unholy hands; and here stands the last of their name, a homeless wanderer, with no other inheritance than this mark of the curse and crime of his race." So saying, he pulled off the old woollen hat, and exhibited his head perfectly smooth and guiltless of a single hair.

"That old heads should become bald, is no uncommon occurrence," I observed, "and I have seen younger heads as hairless as yours."

"My head," he returned, "from my birth to this moment, never knew a single hair, my father and grandfather endured the same privation, while my great-grandfather was deprived of his long and copious locks in one fearful moment. I shall tell you the story as we go along, if your curiosity lies in the direction of this pathway."

As we proceeded he delivered the following legend. The old man's phraseology was bygone and energetic, qualities which I have vainly striven to infuse into this translation, for an abler pen would fail in our cold English of doing justice to the very poetical language of the narrator.

"Many a young March has passed over the head of me since Cahmel Barry fixed at Lisnagar. He was of the true blood of the old Strongbow chiefs, who became so strongly princes in the land, that the Irish kings with the ancient owners of the soil, renounced the Saxon connection and name. This noble family gloried in the title of M'Adam and the colonel did not shame his descent. He kept open house for all comers, and every day an ox was killed and consumed at Lisnagar. All the gentlemen of the province thronged thither, hunting and hawking, and feasting and cosherring, while the hall was crowded with harpers and pipers, "seanachie and "tuckaghs," and "shanachies", and story-tellers, who came and went as they pleased, in constant succession. I myself, said the old man, sighing, "have seen a remnant of these good old times, but now they are crushed for ever, the genius of hospitality has retired from the chieftain's hall to the hovel on the moor, and the wandering minstrels sigh from lofty groves and stately towers to the shelter of the peasant's cabin!

"David Barry and his seven brothers lived with M'Adam, and were of his own name and race, and whether he enjoyed the sport of the chase, or took the diversion of shooting, or moved among the high and titled of the land, they always accompanied him, and formed a sort of body-guard, to share his sports or assert his quarrels at fairs, or on the banks of the Bride, near the ruined tower of Shanacloch, lived a man named Edmund Barry. A thick and friary covert on his farm had been for many years the haunt of a fox celebrated all over the south of Ireland for the extraordinary speed and prowess he evinced in the many attempts made to hunt him down. Many gallant and brilliant cavaliers sought the honor of bearing home his brush, but in vain and it was a remarkable fact, that after tiring out both hounds and horses in the arduous pursuit, and though his flight might extend over a considerable part of the province, he invariably returned at night to his favorite covert. A treaty of peace, if it was secure, had been concluded between Edmund Barry and the fox. Barry's poultry for a series of years, when they sought the banker of the Bride or the neighborhood of the barn door, never suffered by the dangerous vicinity. Reynard would not with Barry's dogs and spend an hour of social intercourse with them, as familiarly as if he belonged to the same species and Barry gave his wild crafty friend the same protection and licence that he permitted his own domestic cats. The fame of this strange union of interests was well known; and within day the memory of Barry's "master fox" survives in the traditions of the country.

"One evening as M'Adam and his train returned from a long an unsuccessful chase of Edmund Barry's fox, their route lay by the ruins of the old church of Kildinan, this sacred spot a whitethorn tree had stood, and its beauty and bloom were the theme of every tongue. The temple devotee who poured his orisons to God beneath its holy shade believed that the hands of guardian spirits pruned its luxuriance and developed its form of beauty that dews from heaven were sprinkled upon its leaves to produce its rich and beautiful blossoms, which, leaded the black winds of December with many a token of holy fragrance in welcome of the heavenly advent of Jesus. But His Father's throne to restore to the sons of Adam the lost inheritance of heaven, M'Adam was charmed with the beauty of the tree, and little regarding the sanctity or the superstitions awe attached to its character, was resolved to transfer it to Lisnagar, that his lawn might possess that rare species of thorn which blooms in beauty when all its sisters of the field are bare and barren.

"Next day, when M'Adam signified his intention of removing the whitethorn of Kildinan, his people stood aghast at his impiety, and one and all declared they would suffer a thousand deaths rather than perpetrate a sacrilegious sacrilege. Now, M'Adam was a man of high blood and haughty bearing, and accustomed at all times to the most rigid enforcement of his commands. "Here are seven of your own name and race," cried David Barry, "men sworn to share his sports or assert his quarrels at fairs, or on the banks of the Bride, near the ruined tower of Shanacloch, lived a man named Edmund Barry. A thick and friary covert on his farm had been for many years the haunt of a fox celebrated all over the south of Ireland for the extraordinary speed and prowess he evinced in the many attempts made to hunt him down. Many gallant and brilliant cavaliers sought the honor of bearing home his brush, but in vain and it was a remarkable fact, that after tiring out both hounds and horses in the arduous pursuit, and though his flight might extend over a considerable part of the province, he invariably returned at night to his favorite covert. A treaty of peace, if it was secure, had been concluded between Edmund Barry and the fox. Barry's poultry for a series of years, when they sought the banker of the Bride or the neighborhood of the barn door, never suffered by the dangerous vicinity. Reynard would not with Barry's dogs and spend an hour of social intercourse with them, as familiarly as if he belonged to the same species and Barry gave his wild crafty friend the same protection and licence that he permitted his own domestic cats. The fame of this strange union of interests was well known; and within day the memory of Barry's "master fox" survives in the traditions of the country.

Dr. Woodbridge on the Foreign-born Element.

It would be as difficult a task to make "a silk purse out of a sow's ear," as it would be to expect a Presbyterian preacher to tell the truth when speaking of the Catholic Church or Catholic citizens. Take, for instance, Dr. Woodbridge, of this city, who lately alluded to "foreign-born citizens" in one of his Sunday's diatribes, after this fashion

> A large majority of our population are from Roman Catholic, or irreligious, or heathen communities, where the Sabbath is not observed, where either there is no House of God, or where the Bible is not taken as the rule of life. Our rulers are mostly elected by the foreign-born element. They control our schools, and have rejected the Bible from their doors. They force their Sabbath desecration upon our nation. They turn our freedom into licentiousness. One of their number but yesterday attempted to assassinate the President of the United States, and filled the land with grief and shame that such a crime could be committed in free, enlightened America.

We sincerely pity the puerile Presbyterian preacher who could descend so much pettifogging as this in his pulpit. Outside of the Chinese—whom Dr. Woodbridge and his kind have invited to these shores—we are not afraid to contrast the moral character of the "foreign-born element" in America with the native-born element, no matter whether it comes from the cold hills of Connecticut or the warmer clime of California. Millions of emigrants from the several countries of Europe have arrived in this country pure in mind, firm in morals and practical in religion, but a few years contact with the society which surrounded them, soon turned their piety into poison, and sapped all the props from under the moral lessons taught them by their European parents. Thousands of souls have been stolen from the Catholic Church by this very infidel influence which permeates through what Dr. Woodbridge would call "purely American society," where blasphemy and beastliness is not confined to the hoodlum element alone, but may be found in the various phases of life—from those who patronize the bar-room to those who occupy the jury-room. It is by means of this contact with corrupt classes that our foreign-born element has fallen from the pure state of religion and morals which shielded them from crime in their own countries, but which has caused them, in most instances, to descend to the lowest depths of depravity in this land where chicanery and corruption are successfully charged against politicians, parsons, the press, and public men generally—from the lowest scavenger on public works up to the President himself. Is it any wonder, then, that "our foreign-born" element should become tainted by the filth which tarnishes the character of our brightest and best among the native-born—including the Bible for examples of probity, morality and justice?

Dr. Woodbridge, we suspect, belongs himself to our "foreign-born element," else he would not have been guilty of the anti-American expression "Our rulers are mostly elected by the foreign-born element." In this land we have no rulers; every public official is the people's servant, who must obey the sovereign will of the populace, and in the election of all officials the native-born element casts its vote as well as the foreign-born, hence this discrimination against a certain class of citizens stamps Dr. Woodbridge as a Pickwickized Presbyterian preacher whose prejudices are unworthy of that liberal spirit which should mark the sentiments of every true American. Dr. Woodbridge also fabricates an untruth when he tells his hearers that the foreign-born element controls "our schools," because it is an irrefutable fact that a large majority of adopted citizens pay but little regard to the ringsters who squander the taxes of the people upon a system of education that has done more to paganize the people than all other causes combined. Nor has the Bible been "kicked from the doors" of our foreign-born citizens, but the good Book has been made the stepping-stone to place and power on the part of political parsons and demagogical dancers who literally "wave the livery of heaven in order to serve the devil." At best, the Bible is only the trade-mark of trafficers on the credulity of that infinitesimal portion of the Protestant community who still imagine that because a man preaches Christianity he should be believed and be made the custodian of the confidence of the people. But we have too many doctors of the Woodbridge school in the American pulpit, and the people are rapidly realizing the fact that a man may be a poor preacher and a worse political hack, notwithstanding his pretended piety.

Dr. Woodbridge is guilty of downright falsehood when he declares that Guiteau belongs to the "foreign-born element." The father and grandfather of the would-be assassin of the President were natives of this land, and he is a true type of that class of fanatical frauds generated by such gospel as that preached by Dr. Woodbridge himself. This serves all the sanctimonious pettifogging preacher for the present, but next week we will take up another phase which this politico-sermon introduced into his Presbyterian pulpit.

New Bishops Appointed.

A dispatch from Rome announces the appointment of Rev. M. W. Wigger, D. D., present pastor of St. Vincent's church, Madison, New Jersey, as Bishop of Newark. Also Rev. M. J. O'Farrell, now pastor of St. Peter's church, New York, as Fr. Hoff, of the new Diocese of Trenton.

George F. Phelan's Compilation of Catholic Poetry.

It is our fervent prayer that the Lord may have mercy on the sins of George F. Phelan. The man is not dead, but then he had better be laid away in "the tomb of the Capulets than live to entail so much misery upon himself, his publisher and his readers—if he has any!—by issuing a book of poems with the following fallacious title-page, taken from our own Bible, Bible readers, Sections from Catholic American Poets. By Geo. F. Phelan. New York: P. O'Shea, 1881.

The intention of Mr. Phelan was, no doubt, commendable, but why confine the work of "Catholic American Poets" to thirty-two in number, and then limit their work to one hundred pages of small-pica print? American contains Catholic poets whose names shine far more resplendent in the empyrean of song than many Mr. Phelan has favored in his fancy-covered compilation, yet there is no mention whatever of them.

A Mr. Martin Burke has written an introduction to the book before us, in which he volunteers the assertion that "the present volume of poems has been collected with much judgment," a statement which is emphatically incorrect and practically untrue, because Mr. Phelan's "judgment" should have suggested to him the names of Father Ryan, Harriet M. Skidmore, Marcella Fitzgerald, Kate E. Quinlan, and a host of other truly Catholic poets, no one of whose poems are printed in the paltry volume "collected with much judgment from purely Catholic sources." Mr. Burke also tells us that a few of these poems have been collected from periodicals "which have long ceased to exist, but we are left in the dark as to whether the poems were or were not the cause of killing periodicals which otherwise might yet be accounted among the living literature of the day.

The poems selected by Mr. Phelan may be classed as good, bad and indifferent, and, among the latter, we must class Mr. Hyder's sonnet, wherein we find the phrase "Sabbath morn," an expression that should never mar poetry coming from a purely Catholic mind. If Mr. Phelan intended this volume for a scrap-book of poetical scraps, to be read at random in a railway carriage, he has succeeded admirably, but as a volume intended to convey to the reading world the true genius of Catholic poetic literature in America—it is a most miserable failure. The printing, binding and paper are all good, but it is a pity to see such splendid material wasted upon sonnets and soft nothings that lack the pulse of true poetry or the revelations of purely religious thought. Of course there are some good poems in the book, but the larger part of them should have been left to rest in oblivion among the unpressed pages of the magazines which Mr. Burke so delightfully assures us "have long ceased to exist."

In justice to Mr. Phelan, we must inform our readers that he states in a brief note prefixed to the volume that he does not claim to have included all Catholic American poets in his volume. We find no fault with him on this score, but we do most earnestly protest against the mauling-bishop nothings which he has given us in this volume, to the exclusion of poems that would be calculated to create a taste for Catholic reading in the minds of the rising generation. Poems, too, that would inspire all who read them with devotion to something nobler than self-gratification for our holy faith—a feature which few of the poems in the present volume are calculated to arouse even in the heart of the most practical Catholic, who loves poetry for the beauty of its expression and the inspiration fire which it is calculated to illumine in every Catholic heart.

Mr. Phelan (like a great many other people in the world), in compiling this volume of poetical lollipops, undertook a task for which he had no qualification and about which he knew positively nothing; hence, he merely purchased a few second-hand magazines of by-gone days; he then invested a few dimes in a paste-pot and scissors, and he ran his fingers through his diabevelled hair, and said, sotto voce "Ahem! Now the world will see a volume of poetic gems with genius resplendent in every line and harmonious sounds in every measure!" The volume he called "GLEANINGS," but such a title is a misnomer, as a far more appropriate title would be "Dregs from the Dens of Catholic Poets." We hope, therefore, that some person who has the taste, knowledge and skill necessary for such a task, will compile a volume of American Catholic poetry, in which California and her half-dozen Catholic poets will not be discarded in order to make room for a lot of the worthless fetsam and jetsam of defunct magazines, killed, maybe, by the nauseating doses of drool and drivel which are now resurrected for Catholic readers under an empty title, and in guarantee that only a portion of the shoddy stuffing to be merely saw-dust and sham.

Ingersoll's Opinion of Presbyterians.

The Washington Post has interviewed Mr. Robert Ingersoll, and asked him all manner of questions about his recent tour of the West. Among other things, the colonel is reported to have said "I will say that I like the natives. I met a great number of real big-hearted, generous Americans. I am told, though, that the Pueblos are most accomplished, industrious, honest, ignorant and harmless people; that they are as patient as the little donkeys that they mind. The Pueblos are all Catholics, and have been turned over by the Interior Department to the Presbyterians. It seems to me almost cruel to take advantage of a poor fellow, in this way. It is bad enough to be a savage, but to be a savage and a Presbyterian is too much. The Pueblos are now a good sort of folks, but after the Presbyterians have had them in charge for a few years they had better be satisfied."

Suicides in San Francisco.

One of the surest tests by which the irreligious tendency of the times may be clearly and fully established, is the increased number of suicides and the favor with which are act grossly insulting to God is looked upon by the press and its victims—the misguided readers. In former days, rather religion had been banished from society, it was considered a disgrace of the deepest dye to be the unfortunate relative, even, of a person who committed suicide. Society had such a horror of the dreadful crime that even the common law prevented the corpse of a suicide from being buried in the same enclosure with those who died natural deaths. The cross-roads—where the passing public might have the warning of the suicide's crime and its consequence—were deemed good enough for the coward who so far forgot his Christianity as to be guilty of self-murder.

But, as time rolls on, the world, it seems, is becoming more "enlightened," and the damning act, which even the civil law condemned, is looked upon in these times with a degree of self-glory which elevates the suicide into a sort of martyr in the eyes of those whose "enlightenment" has taught them that there is no God to give or take life at His will, but that every man is at liberty to "shuffle off this mortal coil" however and whenever he thinks it impreferable to bear the burdens of life any longer.

This is the spirit manifested by society which makes suicide both common and even commendable; hence, we need not wonder when we read in the Chronicles of a report that in this single city of San Francisco no less than thirty-four cases of suicide occurred in the last six months! Did the press publish any criticisms censuring these acts? Did the people express any horror at the criminal culprits who took their lives in their hands and went before the judgment seat of God bathed in their own blood? No! neither the press nor the people had a single protest to offer against this shocking crime. The press that would dare to thwart mankind in its freedom for self-murder would be considered "behind the age," and it would lose cast as a periodical suitable for current public sentiment. Hence the press, like the suicides themselves, in their wanton unconsciousness craven that dares not to run counter to that anti-Christian characteristic of society which has risen up in rebellion against the laws of God and supplanted religion and moral law in the hearts of the "enlightened" masses of this magnified age.

It is curious to note, that of the thirty-four cases of suicide reported in this city, the United States was claimed as the birthplace of twelve of the self-destroyers, and as so much "intelligence" is attributed to "our common school system, we presume this only fair to attribute this mania for making away with human life to the superior educational facilities afforded by what demagogues designate as "the bulwark of our liberties." Germany ranks next in the number of suicides, that nation having seven representatives in the house of Satan. Then comes Ireland, furnishing four of her fervent sons to swell the cowardly army who flew in the face of God with all their sins upon their heads, "all dasted sins of good old Erin!" How degenerate, indeed, must not that Irishman become who turns away from the teaching of the Church of God, and of his own dear parents, his native land, and deems his soul to be saved by means of suicide.

The Catholic Church condemns with its severest anathemas the crime of suicide. Her pastors will not perform the last rites of religion over the prostrate form of that vicious wretch who takes the law of life and death into his own hands, and thus defrauds Almighty God of one of His supreme prerogatives. The Church so strongly condemns this crime that she will not even permit the carcass of the suicide to mingle its corruption with the remains of those faithful children of the Church who have died naturally in the love and fear of God. But in this respect, as in other matters pertaining to morality, the Church has to stand alone on the side of Christ, the whole world being arrayed against her. Yet, notwithstanding the frowns and sneers of society, as well as the criminal course pursued even by the press, in this regard, the Church will continue to raise her voice of warning to her children to avoid the abominable act of suicide, and so to shape their lives as to make suicide impossible—by following in the footsteps marked upon the pathway of life by the saints who have preceded us to the goal of Christian death.

The Land Bill.

According to this week's telegrams, the Irish Land Bill is dragging its course very slowly through the British Parliament. The measure has been so weighted down by amendments that the tenor of the original bill has been entirely altered, and whatever was favorable to the Irish tenant-farmers has been almost entirely eliminated from the original bill. At last accounts there were no less than 854 amendments attached to the original bill, of the number nearly one-half came from the Liberals, 200 were the product of the Irish members, whilst the Conservatives tacked on 200. It seems to be the conviction of the most prominent politicians and Land Leagues agitators in Ireland that the Land Bill will not be worth the paper upon which it is written—so far as the Irish tenants are concerned—when the measure has been ground out of John Bull's hopper.

Cardinal Manning will visit Scotland before summer is over, and he is all upon the neighborhood of Glasgow, at least one church.

Public School Insults to Catholic Children.

Doubtless there are Catholic parents who are ignorant of the insults adopted by the superintendents and teachers in the public schools to destroy Catholic faith, and, in fact, all sentiments of Christianity, in the minds of Catholic children. It is the duty of the Catholic press to warn these parents of the dangers thus incurred, and in fulfillment of that duty we have to report the perpetration of an outrage upon the religious convictions of Catholic children that should cause every person connected therewith to be hooted out of decent society.

There is a periodical published in Boston under the title of The National Teacher's Education, hundreds of copies of which are received in this city and circulated among the public school scholars. The paper being recommended by teachers and principals, many Catholic pupils are induced to subscribe a stipulated sum for one or more copies of this Boston paper, and such Catholic parents as send their children into these schools of Satan should know the kind of literature contained in this Boston periodical. A copy of which has been furnished us from the hands of a Catholic child who was horrified to find such shocking insults to her religious convictions in the columns of a paper which she had been told was solely devoted to educational matters.

The copy before us is No. 19 of Vol. 20, the first page of which is devoted to Joseph Cook's calumnies on the Catholic Church, with an addenda to placate Catholic children, taken from a Catholic paper. Catholic parents, how do you like the static and slimy slanders of Joseph Cook to be forced down the throats of your Catholic children? Take, for instance, a single paragraph, as we find it printed in this paper, and we ask the parent of any Catholic child who reads as his daughter reads the following extract from the chapter of calumnies before us:

> "It was the tyrant of the Roman Church in both sides of the sea—that was Roman Church must take care of the children of Roman parents (parents! mean!) [A sister [one follows] the [illegible] and then an outburst of applause was repeated.]

This is only one sentence out of nearly a page full of just such beastly calumny, and yet it is presented to Catholic children under the special cloak of the columns of a National Journal of Education.

Are Catholics such cowards as to permit their children to be so grossly insulted by the blatant bigots who control the public power in public school affairs? Let it be seen that Catholic parents have no religious rights which School Boards and school superintendents are bound to respect. It is a permit such gross infractions of the right of conscience to pass by unnoticed, then, indeed, we place the lash in the hands of our enemies, and we deserve no sympathy when they flagellate us with the ten bodies, raw sins. Catholics are too dormant on this vital question. They need to arouse from their lethargy and show the infidels and bigots that they are not cattle, but have rights and intelligence to maintain them. By such a course they would compel their religious insults to respect their religious convictions, and prevent the circulation of such calumnious documents among Catholic children. We understand that in the Normal School of this city Mr. Sweet throws the weight of his official influence towards aiding in the circulation of this anti-Catholic pill-cracker, and also that the pupils attending that school are compelled to subscribe for this sheet. If this is not so, we shall be glad to give Mr. Sweet the benefit of a denial, but if it is so, it must be stopped forthwith.

The Patriotic Parnells.

The Parnells are a glorious family. The first of them that come to the surface in Irish history is Henry Parnell, the friend of Swift, and the author of the "Hermit," one of the finest poems in the English language. We expect Sir John Parnell, Speaker of the Irish House of Commons, to appear title as the salt of the ocean, proof against all the gold of England, her titles, and the blandishments of the Duchesses, who, when offers of place and titles failed, bared the sweet-scented bust to win his social enchantments. If no other man or woman of the race arose after Sir John to advocate the cause of Ireland when it was at least, the name of Parnell would still be entitled to a luminous paragraph in Irish history, and a place in the Irish heart, but as if to overpower a nation with its debt of gratitude, Charles Stewart Parnell arose just when such a man was required, and with him the members of his talented family, his mother, illustrious as the mother of the Gracchi, his sister, Anna Parnell, and his sister, also, Fanny Parnell. It is written of Mrs. Parnell that, like the Marchioness of Queensberry, she assisted the men of 1867 with her means and relieved their families after the failure of the rising. Miss Anna Parnell is now in Ireland in charge of the Ladies Land League, travelling through the country, encouraging the people, delivering eloquent speeches and assisting the good cause with her means and her ability. Miss Fanny Parnell, is to America what her sister is to Ireland, an organizer of the Ladies Land League and as such of unalienable service to the country which she loves as well as her whole her family have done so much. Miss Parnell is a poet, and one of no mean order. The few pieces she has written have been widely copied and favorably commented upon in even a hostile press; there is a vein of sharp sarcasm running through them which strikes home, and what a sense of truth and justice which can only emanate from one with a pure and, at the same time, an indignant spirit.

More Jesuits Expelled.

A dispatch from Panama says that nine more Jesuits, recently expelled by the Nicaraguan Government, arrived at Greytown recently. The anti-Christian who formulates the laws against the members of that Nicaraguan Government treated the Jesuits well, paid their passages, and gave them $1,000 or so to help them on their way, and other little things necessary to a comfortable voyage. Such partial unseeing at mercy as these sentiments indicate, stamps the writer as one of the lody guardedness of those whose souls in this world can never be completely accomplished until he has banished from human vision the vanishers of that glorious Order bearing the hell-hatred name of the SOCIETY OF JESUS.

It requires no great penetration to discover the source of the error when he says that the Jesuits were provided with money "to pay their wine bills," but we cannot too strongly condemn the indignant and mendacious scoundrel who would thus use the power of the press in order to impose upon the reading world that the Jesuits lived only in order to enjoy the comforts of life and the accompanying luxuries thereof. It may not be known to the world, but it is absolutely true, that there never has been a more calumniated, more charge than this Jesuit order against any community. It was not enough to rob the Jesuits of the houses they had built, the land they had purchased and the goods they had earned out of money procured by their labors. But they must be sent into exile under the lash of one of the most beastly calumnies that the Father of Lies could invent.

Cardinal Manning and the Land League.

On the 30th inst. a deputation of Irish farm laborers waited on Cardinal Manning for the purpose of administering his views upon the Land League agitation. In reply to an address delivered by their spokesman of the delegation, his eminence said, "I read that the Land League, whose meetings are in the limits of human and divine law, always received his warmest sympathy. He had ever regarded that organization as legitimate, and so long as the operations were confined to legal redress for Irish wrongs, it should never meet with any opposition from him. On the contrary, his prayers would attend its endeavors.

The Cardinal also spoke in high praise of the recent speeches of the Archbishop of Cashel, and added that, in his estimate, so long as the League was under the guidance of the faithful and patriotic Bishops and priests of Ireland, it would be directed in a safe and a successful path. Alluding to the condition of the Irish farm laborers, the Cardinal lamented that the Land Bill, on its present form, could afford no relief for that class of suffering Irishmen, and suggested that an appeal be made to Parliament for the establishment of a commission, whose duty it would be to report upon the state of the Irish farm laborers, and thus bail could be framed compelling those possessing an interest in the soil to provide adequate dwellings for the laborers, the sons of the present miserable more than slaves, who are a disgrace to humanity.

Riotous Proceedings in Rome.

During the recent memorial services in Rome in commemoration of the death of Pope Pius IX., the infidel element, prompted, no doubt, by the Italian government, rudely assaulted the faithful Catholics who had peacefully assembled in order to form a funeral procession for the removal of the body of Pius IX. Cardinal Jacobini has been instructed to inform the several Ambassadors and Ministers accredited to Rome by foreign governments, the nature of the outrage perpetrated upon the religious procession. There can be little hope, however, that the infidelical government of Europe will make any movement towards censuring their equally infidel Italian brother. The people of the present day are no wiser than their predecessors of the first Christian century when they preferred that Barrabas should be saved and that Christ should be crucified.

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

A Ride Across the Sierras from Stevenville to Smartsville Depopulated Mining Towns The Future Outlook for Mining Interests in California.

The stage ride from Truckee to Sierra City is across a route that presents a diversity of scenery. Emerging from the woods the road skirts Sierra Valley, one of the most prolific spots in the northern section of the State, and then it follows the course of the foothills until it mounts the summit of the Sierras, where the traveler finds the snow line only a few feet above the road. Sierraville is a pretty rural village located at the opening of the valley of the same name, while Sierra City is situated in a gorge of the mountains in a mineral region that—when developed will astonish the world with its richness. At the latter place Cathy Kirley, of Downsville, has recently erected a small, but neat church, as there are several Catholic families residing in the immediate vicinity.

Upon my arrival at Downsville, Father Kirley at once kindly introduced me to his flock, and through his personal efforts and influence I was enabled to increase the circulation of the MONITOR, not only here, but also in Forest City and adjacent places. Downsville has not a large Catholic population, consequently the church is insignificant in size and badly built, looking in the relics of bygone days. Father Kirley's mission is one of the most extensive in the Diocese, and during the winter months he is compelled to travel on snow shoes in answer to sick calls over mountains that are difficult of access even under the most favorable circumstances. The ride to Forest City is one of the most beautiful scenery imaginable, and during the winter months the Rev. gentleman has to make his way through the snow drifts, a distance of 18 miles, on his snow shoes. The building, including the organ gallery, was crowded, many Protestants being present from Nevada and the members of the congregation not less than eight hundred.

The church is a frame building on a high brick foundation, and is fifty feet wide by ninety-four feet long; externally, exclusive of the tower and porch, it is the neatest and most attractive of any in the county, having a depth of twenty feet, thus giving ample room for celebrating the ceremonies of the Church, and is lit by four lancet windows, at a height of twenty feet above the chancel floor. Chapels of our Lady and St. Joseph are formed on each side of the sanctuary, and separated from it and from the body of the church by moulded arches, which springing from polished granite pillars. The roof of the body of the church is supported by five arched trusses resting on vases and filled with tracery. The corbels and side-board are also finished in open work the former with the Lamb and Cross, the latter with a series of conventional leaves. The ceiling is formed of narrow strips of ornamental wood, the moulds which give free passage to the air. The wainscoting, pews and confessionals are all finished in red and white wood, and varnished, the latter also being gilded.

Externally, the church is of a dark purple and brown, which gives it a height of 122 feet, with a gilded cross on top of the chimney. The tower stands at the south side of the church, and has an entrance from Main street; but the chief entrance is by a lofty porch in the large central doors freely embossed in either side, and giving unique facilities for egress, even to a congregation of the size of that of Forest City. The windows are filled with stained glass, made in San Francisco, by Mr. John Mallon, and the whole of the work is simple and the great front window represents the Crucifixion, the side windows are the usual series of the saints in California, the latter being specially presented by individuals whose names are inscribed on the lower panes; the windows are of a uniform size, and are placed at the south side of the building, with a view to a future aisle, which will be added when the means will admit of it.

Terrill & Sawyer of San Francisco were the architects, and deserve the highest credit for the manner in which they have executed their work. The architect was Mr. J. J. Healy, of San Francisco, and the general outline is a standard measure of his skill in his profession.

As an evidence of Father Kirley's intention to raise the old church, as a school, until it can be replaced by a more suitable structure, I subscribed five dollars in aid of the work, and I feel sure that a generous response will be made to his appeal for funds.

GOLDEN WEDDING AT SAN JOSE.

Last Sunday, July 10, fifty years ago to-day Michael Sullivan, a native of this county, were married in Quebec, Upper Canada, to Miss Ann Gerard, a native of Ireland, who came to this state with her father in 1849, and married their golden wedding at their farm at Mountain View, to-day. In the city the banks closed at noon and many of the business houses followed suit, these being managed by employes while many were present in the reunion. It was the greatest social event of the year in this county. At 10 o'clock four carloads of friends reached the Mayfield ranch at Mountain View, and at 11 o'clock a thirty-horse team arrived from San Jose. Soon afterwards people went from all parts of the country, and at 12 o'clock it was estimated that thirty-horse teams were scattered over the ground. The reception was perfectly picturesque in its surroundings. Nature, trees, vines and bushes made a fine setting for the scene, and, aside from these, there were wagon loads of flowers, and baskets, boxes and packages of presents. The guests were generally dressed in their best clothes, and the ladies were in the latest fashions. Mass was celebrated by Father Kirley, who was assisted by Father Slattery, a member of the family from Francisco and other parts joined the social circle of the church, and rendered the music with exquisite taste. The building, including the organ gallery, was crowded, many Protestants being present from Nevada and the members of the congregation not less than eight hundred.

The church is a frame building on a high brick foundation, and is fifty feet wide by ninety-four feet long; externally, exclusive of the tower and porch, it is the neatest and most attractive of any in the county, having a depth of twenty feet, thus giving ample room for celebrating the ceremonies of the Church, and is lit by four lancet windows, at a height of twenty feet above the chancel floor. Chapels of our Lady and St. Joseph are formed on each side of the sanctuary, and separated from it and from the body of the church by moulded arches, which springing from polished granite pillars. The roof of the body of the church is supported by five arched trusses resting on vases and filled with tracery. The corbels and side-board are also finished in open work the former with the Lamb and Cross, the latter with a series of conventional leaves. The ceiling is formed of narrow strips of ornamental wood, the moulds which give free passage to the air. The wainscoting, pews and confessionals are all finished in red and white wood and varnished, the latter also being gilded.

Externally, the church is of a dark purple and brown, which gives it a height of 122 feet, with a gilded cross on top of the chimney. The tower stands at the south side of the church, and has an entrance from Main street; but the chief entrance is by a lofty porch in the large central doors freely embossed in either side, and giving unique facilities for egress, even to a congregation of the size of that of Forest City. The windows are filled with stained glass, made in San Francisco, by Mr. John Mallon, and the whole work is simple and the great front window represents the Crucifixion, the side windows are the usual series of the saints in California, the latter being specially presented by individuals whose names are inscribed on the lower panes; the windows are of a uniform size, and are placed at the south side of the building, with a view to a future aisle, which will be added when the means will admit of it.

Terrill & Sawyer of San Francisco were the architects, and deserve the highest credit for the manner in which they have executed their work. The architect was J. J. Healy, of San Francisco, and the general outline is a standard measure of his skill in his profession.

As an evidence of Father Slattery's intention to raise the old church as a school, until it can be replaced by a more suitable structure, I subscribed five dollars in aid of the work, and I feel sure that a generous response will be made to his appeal for funds.

ST. ROSE'S FAIR.

St. Stephen's Hall, Market street, presented a dazzling spectacle on last Tuesday night when the Fair in aid of St. Rose's church, Redwood City, was inaugurated by Most Rev. Archbishop Alemany, assisted by Very Rev. J. Prendergast, V.G., and a large number of the Catholic laity of that city. The chair was taken by Irene Donahue, Esq., who delivered an inaugural address, which he closed by donating the munificent sum of fifty dollars each to the two tables.

IN MEMORIAM.

Never perhaps since the foundation of the Sacred Order in this diocese, has a member of that Order died more universally and deservedly beloved than the Rev. Brother Jerome, of the Convent Chapel on the morning of Friday the 15th inst. Sister Mary Bernard of Jesus, whose pure soul left its prison-house at 3 o'clock, plus failed at noon in the previous Wednesday, exercised an influence that was simply irresistible—for who knew her, and it is needless to add that she employed the charms with which nature so richly endowed her in the best service of the Divine Spouse and Master. Humble, sweet and truly humility and unselfishness, nature and supplied that the charms and virtues palpable to the most casual observer were apparently unknown to herself. And to this humility a deep-rooted devotion to the sick and poor, and yet into the other characteristics of the noble Sister's life. Never one was she known to allow her sweet calm of her placid soul to be disturbed by the unreasonable exactions and grumblings of the poor crippled patients. On the contrary, she seemed to feel a real pleasure in gratifying their every wish, no matter how whimsical. And in this way she gained over to the place of a repentant death many poor souls, to whom the priest and already appealed in vain, for her there was no distinction of persons, outside the rich and poor and unfortunate, all were, in all truth, her brothers and sisters, she loved to call them. For more than three years her health has been gradually failing, and the sufferings she has endured during months of weeks old that had died in the interval. The little group had their tickets for Chicago, but the railroad company could not take the dead baby along, so they were sent back to Castle Garden.

A Miss McGinty was married in Louisville the Thursday, and the Courier-Journal's account of the event was headed "Married in May." We suppose that "Joined in June" and "Attached in August" will be the fate of those who come later in the season. So says the Graphic. Now, looking to the sometimes consequential consummate, we supply illustrative addenda, and say "Separated in September" and "Divorced in December."

TOPICS OF THE TIMES.

The whole United States army is not so large as the Russian army in Europe is now manning in Ireland.

The Curragh of Kildare is said to be the finest race course in Europe. It is a mere meadow, unbreakable, and contains 1,000 acres.

During the last 15 years 6,000 divorces have been granted in Connecticut, or more by 6,250, than had been granted during the previous 100 years.

Italy is in a bad way, and the diseased common people are emigrating to various portions of Europe. Hundreds of thousands of unwholesome food has bred an epidemic, and there seems no chance of an improvement in social conditions so long as the present policy is pursued.

—A writer in the London Queen, "Subscriber's Newspaper," says the most important influence of women in England to-day is a significant presage of the country's destiny. Where women are most emancipated there is something wrong with the man, argues the writer, and points in proof of this to the Mormons and Turks.

—A stable dispatch to the New York Herald says "Hundreds of once magnificent estates in England are now untenanted. In some counties nearly 50 per cent. of the land is out of cultivation; in all, property may be rented for the same. Rents are falling and will rent sells are rapidly diminishing." This state of things is ascribed to American competition in agricultural products.

—The navy has another chaplain, and as the Episcopalians had before only ten out of the twenty-three Chaplains, this vacancy has been selected from that denomination. Of the ten appointed, only seven have been Episcopalians. This a violation of the principles of property and justice looked at from any standpoint.

—Mr. Arthur O'Connor, M.P., in a letter to the Dublin Freeman's Journal, laments the increasing tendency of the Irish tenants in the English army. In 1869 the number of recruits raised in Ireland was 8,000, in 1881 the average number during the next five years was 2,250, and during the five years ending in 1879, the average number for each year had grown to 3,350. Irish regiments are, he states, sent on foreign service oftener than they should be.

—An affecting scene took place in the office of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company in Jersey city yesterday afternoon. A party of four German emigrants sat by the track for two hours awaiting a train. A young wife held in her arms a dead baby. A weeks old that had died in the interval. The little group had their tickets for Chicago, but the railroad company could not take the dead baby along, so they were sent back to Castle Garden.

THE TENANT HOMES OF IRELAND.

BY MAURICE D. LYNN.

Oh! the tenant homes of Ireland were the finest place on earth,
And the breaking fields of Ireland, each one knew and delight or death;
Is she off, as in the castle, there was charity, there was pride,
When the Tenant and his Master stood, in friendship side by side.

Then the element of our island [illegible]
Irish Land or freeway,
Tenantill Labor sang rejoicing in each lowly field and town;
And the flag of Ireland floated, gladly, proud and free,
From the steeple, from the castles, from the tall ships in the sea.

Then patriot power and charity, like the rainbow hand in hand,
Gave comfort to the callant man who ventured to the land;
Then mutual trust and righteous laws, and bearing Ireland's awards,
Made equal rights and proper rank to peasants and to lords.

Nations were quiet with honor, as in days of old, with arms,
Ireland's land—freeway,
No children pining, sighing, while the rich dinner [illegible]
Nor hollow-eyed wails, and leveled roads, to mark the lost of rails;
No fanatic estimate cursed their land, the sweet and fair Ireland.

Negro hands wrecked the wrong that made will not tear,
So none forced the murderous deed that
Irish rule will dare;
So process reared their hideous mills in and pride array,
To life the rage and scorn of Ireland's
Ireland's day.

Guardians of the People! the sources of the Poor!
Were fully more to trust in your power
to endure;
Alas! we stand for all that man should and defend,
And, by all our hopes of Heaven,
Irish must have an end.

This not again to baffle us—we are stronger yet than
Your cities, state, your cities power, have lished like a dream;
From Ireland's people, from East and West, come like rushing waves—
Patriotism's [illegible] to see the Lazarus the Slaves.

NEW CATHOLIC SCHOOLS IN OAKLAND

The Catholics of Oakland are a select of praiseworthy for their venerable and venerable pastor for the splendid educational facilities which he has provided for them in the shape of commodious and well-appointed parochial schools. On Monday, the school houses were dedicated by Father King, were thrown open to the public and hundreds of whom were in attendance. The Sisters Teachers have charge of the schools for boys, and the girls, under the care of the Sisters of the Most Holy Name.

ST. MARY'S FAIR.

The Catholic Hall, Market street, presented a dazzling spectacle on last Tuesday night when the Fair in aid of St. Peter's church, Redwood City, was inaugurated by Most Rev. Archbishop Alemany, assisted by Very Rev. J. Prendergast, V.G., and a large number of the Catholic laity of that city. A BISHOP ON THE CATHOLIC PRESS.

The Catholics of Dunedin in New Zealand presented an address to Bishop Moran on the occasion of his recent departure for Rome, and in answer to it his Lordship made a stirring speech, from which we take: "After the education of our youth and the erection of our churches there is nothing about which I am so anxious as the establishment of a Catholic Press. A Catholic Press is indispensable. Our people have been taught to read well and most read; and if good literature is not provided for them, the moral certainty is that they will pass to the worst writers whose works are neither innocent nor truthful. And if this is true in reference to all time, it is particularly so at the present moment, when dishonesty, infidelity, and error contains almost everything, sends us a collection of Guiteau's essays and poems, published anonymously, Chicago, of course, the good Church of Rome comes in for an assault, in execrable verse, detailing the history of a maiden fair to the Church who was one of that band. After the disease, I was told, a Catholic newspaper for this country, and I was told that I should be taken up in preference of the secular, and that the means suitable for gradually uniting Italian Freemasons to the more important reforms of which Italian Catholics are desirous, and yet the best means to obtain the suppression of the religious congregations, and finally, the different proposals made by the Clergy and the Freiberg." It is not easy to understand what the suppression of the religious congregations, since they have been suppressed for years, but the intention of the Freemasons is clear enough. It is to injure and cripple religion. Mgr. Iacobi, Archbishop of Carthagena, some time, has written to an Italian Catholic journalist, to the effect that a counter demonstration representing the Catholics of the world should be held in Rome towards the end of September. This suggestion may not be adopted, but an Italian philanthropic representative, the Catholics of the peninsula will be in Rome about the end of September, and therefore, which on the 8th of September, the Italian Catholics will be attending the festival of the Holy See. DEDICATION OF THE NEW CHURCH IN NAPA.

The church just completed by Rev. M. C. Slattery in Napa City was dedicated to Divine worship on Sunday, the 17th inst., by Most Rev. Archbishop Alemany, assisted by Fathers Gonzalez, of Dolan and Lewis, of Napa Valley. His Grace also preached in the morning, both in English and Spanish. Mass was sung by Father Slattery; a number of friends from San Francisco and other parts joined the social circle of the church, and rendered the music with exquisite taste. The building, including the organ gallery, was crowded, many Protestants being present from Napa, and the members of the congregation not less than eight hundred.

The church is a frame building on a high brick foundation, and is fifty feet wide by ninety-four feet long; externally, exclusive of the tower and porch, it is the neatest and most attractive of any in the county, having a depth of twenty feet, thus giving ample room for celebrating the ceremonies of the Church, and is lit by four lancet windows, at a height of twenty feet above the chancel floor. Wheat Crop of 1881.

While it is now quite evident that the wheat crop of California will fall far below that of last year, it becomes important to note the probable yield of cereals east of the Rocky Mountains in order to arrive at a proximate as to probable prices of grain. The Rural New Yorker is in a position to have reliable data in reference to crop prospects in the Eastern, Middle and Western States, and, with accurate information on the subject during the month of June, it declares that the grain yield will fall 20 per cent. below that of 1880. In speaking of wheat that journal says "Winter wheat has suffered far more severely than spring, and of the vast territory in which this sort is raised, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, and probably Kentucky, with parts of Northern Missouri and Southern Iowa and Wisconsin, have been the heaviest losers. Spring wheat appears to be as thrifty as last year, but owing to the lateness of the season and the floods on the bottom lands in the spring wheat region, the acreage is somewhat less than last year's, except in Northern Minnesota and the Red River country, in which a greatly enlarged acreage has been put in, with highly promising results. The harvesting of winter grain has already advanced as far north as Southern Kansas, Missouri, Illinois, Indiana and Ohio, so that the recent rains will have come too late to injure the fall-sown grain." From this statement of the case it is quite apparent that the present season's crop is not such as to cause a glut in the markets of the world. Should the crops in Europe prove equally short, those possessing a fair quality of shipping wheat are likely to realize higher prices therefore than have ruled for several years past. Argus.

Send the Children to Bed Happy.

Send your little child to bed happy. Whatever cares press, give it a warm good-night kiss as it goes to its pillow. The memory of this, in the stormy days which may be in store for the little one, will be like Bethlehem's star to the bewildered shepherds. "My father—my mother loved me!" Nothing can take away that blessed heart balm, parched with the world's fever it will become dewy again at the thrill of youthful memories. Kiss your child before it goes to bed.

A Pious Custom.

One of the beautiful customs of Catholic countries is to hup a prayer, ever so short, for the souls of departed relations or friends, whenever they are mentioned even in ordinary conversation. The "God rest his soul, spoken from the heart, is a prayer that will be registered in Heaven. Let not these good old Catholic customs vanish.

—He stood with his back against the front door of the street car. Every one else had a seat, and he anxiously watched each face for symptoms of getting out for over three miles. It grew wearisome, and he finally shifted his weight from one foot to the other and exclaimed: "My conscience! have none of you any homes to go to?"

Family Fun.

Piping Off a Miner.

During one of his intermittent visits to the Comstock Mr. Mackay accompanied a party of Eastern tourists to the lower levels of the California mine, one of which carefully selected collection of Massachusetts blue blood being a young lady from Boston who was refined to the top notch of culture. On arriving at one of the lower levels the gasping, perspiring, wilted crew paused, and Mr. Mackay called the young girl's attention to a speaking tube which connected with the level above.

"Is this hollow metal cylinder a conduit of sound?" asked the well-educated Bostonian.

"Yes m," said Mackay; "try it."

The young lady applied her mouth to its opening and piped out a tremulous "Hillo-a-a."

"Aye, aye," shouted a hearty miner a hundred feet above.

"Megs, Megs, The people in this quarter would have protected him, but he felt fully able to protect himself.

On one occasion he was halted by a patrol of Federes, commanded by a big blustering bully in uniform.

"Who are you?" asked the Communist roughly.

"The Father of the poor," answered the Jesuit.

"The father of the poor! What does that mean?"

"It means that I spent 15,000 francs in alms-giving last year. How much did you spend?"

And the stupified Communist stood aside and let him pass.

Leo XIII. and the Little Girl.

Some time ago a wealthy Irishman from San Francisco was passing a few weeks at Rome. Every morning, accompanied by his wife and children, he went to hear Mass at St. Charles of Borro. His generosity towards the Holy Father was such as millionaires alone can show. Before the family left Rome His Holiness was pleased to grant a private audience, which lasted a whole hour. The Vicar of Him who said "Suffer little children to come unto Me," said particular attention to the youngest child, who was three years old. He called her to him and said:

"Now, little one, what would you like to receive from the Pope?"

"I would like ever so much to have your calotte (skull-cap).

"But if I give it to you I won't have any myself."

This objection had been foreseen, and the child replied "Oh, yes, Holy Father, I will give you another, at the same time presenting a beautiful one. The Pope acknowledged himself conquered, and yielded with a good grace.

"Well now, he added, "since you have made me a present, I must make you one some with me." And, taking her by the hand, led her into an adjoining apartment and placed in her hand a document, "Give this for me to your papa."

Our Young Folks.

Let Me Pray First.

A sweet and intelligent little girl was passing quietly through the streets of a certain town, about time since. When she came to a spot where several idle boys were amusing themselves by the dangerous practice of throwing stones. Not deserving her, one of the boys, by accident, threw a stone toward her, and struck her a cruel blow in the eye.

She was carried home in great agony. The doctor was sent for, and a very painful operation was declared necessary. When the time came, and the surgeon had taken out his instruments, she lay in her father's arms, and he asked her if she was ready for the doctor to do what he could to cure her eye.

"No, father, not yet, she replied.

"What do you wish, my child? wait for, my child?"

"I want to kneel in your lap, and pray to Jesus first, she replied

And then kneeling, she prayed a few minutes, and afterward submitted to the operation with all the patience of a strong man.

How beautiful this little girl appears under these trying circumstances! Surely Jesus heard the prayer made in that hour, and he will hear every child that calls upon his name. Even pain can be endured when we ask Jesus to help us.

The Archbishop of Cashel and His Theological Critics.

The following letter has been addressed to the Irish Telegraph:

The Palace, Thurles, June 11.

SIR—Will you allow me to remind you of a short, but sharp, correspondence which appeared in your columns some months ago between me and certain English Biblical scholars in reference to the meaning of St. Paul's words to Timothy, second epistle, second chapter, xxiii verse—"The husbandman that laboreth must first partake of the fruits." The learned gentlemen who undertook to lecture and enlighten me at that time will, I hope, do me now the favor of looking into the "Revised Version of the New Testament," just issued from the press, and read there the rendering of the Greek text in question. Here it is—"The husbandman that laboreth must be the first to partake of the fruits." This fact speaks for itself. It speaks also in no uncertain way for me; inasmuch as it proves to be literally true what I said in a former letter—namely, that "my so-called critics have displayed their own ignorance, while flattering themselves, no doubt, that they were exposing mine."—I remain, sir, your faithful servant,

✠ T. W. Croke, Archbishop of Cashel.

Father Mollerioit.

Father Mollerioit, the distinguished Jesuit who has just died at Paris, did not leave the city during the Commune, but went tranquilly about the streets, wearing his soutane and chlivious of Rigaults and Pompil. The people in his quarter would have protected him, but he felt fully able to protect himself.

On one occasion he was halted by a patrol of Federes, commanded by a big blustering bully in uniform.

TRUSTWORTHY TESTIMONY.

Some Vital Facts Concerning the Welfare of the Community Made Public.

What Californians Say, and How Their Statements are Confirmed.

(Chronicle.)

No fact has been made more plainly manifest during the past few years than the great effect which climatic changes take upon the constitutions of American people. The steady going Saxons of Europe tend to longer lives, but the offspring of Europeans, female in much a sporadic and other similar diseases. On the other hand the budding beauties of the American people generally, the cities excepted, and other important portions of the body, while acute and sudden changes of the atmosphere of Old Mother Eng. difficulties to the nervous.

San Francisco, as well as other cities in the more southern latitudes, is especially subject to these influences and the prominent diseases are particularly at this season of the year, and the most prominent of these are Kidney Troubles. These factors especially time will confirm the the hoarse cough, cold, and the sneezing. Because I thought these and other kidney difficulties has made a specialty of the study of these diseases, I thought I would make a few remarks in reference to the remedy which I have found to be the most powerful in curing these troubles, and I mean Warner's Safe Remedies in my front yard, and took it into my wife. She had formerly lived in Albany, N. Y., and recommended some of the names attached to the testimonials in it. She thought she would like to try the medicine, and so I got her a bottle of Safe Kidney and Liver Cure, and also a bottle of Safe Nervine. It took three doses of Nervine the first night to put her to sleep, the next night only one. The Safe Kidney and Liver Cure has relieved her so much that she can now sleep all night without taking anything. She has taken three bottles of Kidney and Liver Cure, and now feels perfectly well, although she will continue to use it for some time to completely eradicate the disease from her system. I feel that the results of such a wonderful cure should be known to the thousands throughout the land that are suffering from Kidney and Liver Complaint, and say one sufferer from such complaint, or wishing to know more of the results of the remedy, is at liberty to call upon me, or address me on the subject, and I will cheerfully tell them all it has done for my wife.

Mr. J. L. Knapp of Santa Cruz said: "I was taken sick with catarrhal or acute inflamation of the bladder. My sufferings were intense and I was often obliged to get up from ten to fifteen times during the night, when my agony would be so great that I was almost bent double. I employed the best medical aid, both homeopathic and allopathic, but was pronounced by all incurable. They said I could live long, and I thought myself that my time on earth was drawing to a close and gave up all hopes of recovery. My son in St. Louis, knowing how ill I was, sent me some papers containing reports from several of the St. Louis leading physicians and testimonials from a number of citizens concerning the curse resulting from the use of Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure and urged me to try it. I got some of the medicine and immediately commenced its use. After taking a few bottles I found myself rapidly improving until I can now say I am cured.

"What do your physicians say about your recovery?"

"Only a short time ago I met Dr. Carpenter and said to him, 'What do you think of the effect of Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure?' He answered, 'I think that medicine saved a dozen and the way it has acted in your case.'"

In an interview with Mr. William Sesser of Stockton the following facts peculiar to his case were stated:

"Four years ago I was obliged to give up my business on account of sickness, which was proved to be a complication of Kidney and Liver complaints. My liver was greatly enlarged and my ankles so swollen that I could not put on a shoe. I was advised to try Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure. I commenced taking it and found it was just the medicine I needed. I continued to use it for some time, and was cured. I have enjoyed good health ever since, and I attribute my present good health to the use of Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure. The first bottle gave me relief, and I continued to take it, and steadily improved. The swelling commenced to go down, and the hardness in my liver, which could not be reached the morning of my sickness, gradually grew less, and the hardness in my liver, until now it has reached the normal condition. My right side is again strong. If it had not been for this medicine I should have lost my life.

But one testimonial can be drawn from the above facts by any two intelligent individuals. That conclusion must be that while Kidney and Liver difficulties are so alarmingly increasing, still there is a safe and certain means by which they can be avoided, or, having been contracted, a way by which they can positively be cured.

LIFE OF THE Blessed Jordan of Saxony.

FIRST GENERAL OF THE ORDER OF THE PREACHERS.

It would be wonder that the devil, seeing the holiness of this great servant of God, jealous that he was working among the souls of men, tried to entrap him by subtle temptations. Once when he was at Paris, sick of the fever to which he was subject all his life, the malicious spirit, having taken the form of a respectable person, knocked at the gate of the convent, and asked to see Father Jordan. Admitted into his presence, he made a few commonplace remarks, after which, putting on a confidential air, he asked the Blessed Jordan who was present night retire, as he had some special business to transact with Jordan. Then he said "Master, you are at the head of a very holy order, and the eyes of all your Friars are turned towards you. All your acts, whether little or great, have an immense influence upon their fervor. Every irregularity, therefore, on your part, will have its effect, because nature is prompt to decline, and it is an effort so considerable to give any occasion of relaxation or any cause of trouble, you will most certainly be to blame before God. You are ill, it is true, but not so ill as not to be able to do without a sedan chair, and to make a visitation in that newly founded province. The General Chapter of Paris, 1222, had established this rule, and the Provincial of Lombardy, Jordan, built at Carassiasio, Damasus, Bethlehem, Sacarelli, and in several other places of less note. His voyage out was happy, and in Palestine he satisfied his devotion in visiting that part of the earth which had been hallowed forever by the visible presence of the Word made flesh, who deigned to dwell among us. He also labored much for the conversion of the infidels, and to increase the number of the Christians who dwelt there.

In the beginning of the year following he started for home, and embarked on board ship with his Brothers, Father Gerard, who had been his companion for the voyage, and Ely, his other called John. There were in all twenty-nine persons on board. Hardly had the vessel put off from the coast when a terrible storm arose and they were soon wrecked. He lies two companions, and almost all the passengers perished. His body was thrown up by the sea upon the shore, and each night a shining light was seen hovering about it. This attracted the attention of some people who went to see what it was. When they came near the holy body, they smelt a perfume so divine that those who lifted it up preserved it upon their hands for many days. The Inhabitants of the place, Christians, carried him the body of their General, and buried it in their convent church.

Thus tragically ended the life of this holy man, who was full of zeal for His Super, and fervent in labors, for the good of souls. His death was revealed to several holy religious, among whom was a Dominican Father at Limoges, supposed to be Father Gerard of Frachet, who gives an account of it in his book, and to St. Lodgard in Brabant. He appeared and consoled her when she was in a state of spiritual dryness, and told her that he was in heaven, and that she too would soon be called hither.

But the most beautiful apparition was that to a certain Carmelite Friar, who was preparing for death. He heard that Blessed Jordan had been lost at sea, and was much troubled thereat. One day he said to himself, "I, for, after all, in vain to serve God! For was not this man who has perished a saint? Oh, yes! he was a saint, and a reward those who serve Him! But that night a man, encircled with light, appeared to him in his sleep, and addressing him by name, he prayed: "Lord Jesus Christ Jesus, and show us what this is." Then the vision said to him: "I am the Blessed Jordan, Father Jordan, I Father Jordan of whom thou hast doubtedly lived in the world, and yet I am saved." Then he disappeared, leaving the Father in great wonder and joy. Many miracles attested to his uprightness, so that he was always honored as a saint, even before he was included in the catalogue of saints. He was solemnly approved his culture, May 16th, 1826, and allowed the whole Dominican Order to keep his feast.

Blessed Jordan was the author of several works. As well as the commentary on the gospel of St. Luke, before mentioned, he wrote a commentary on the Apocalypse, which is, however, attributed by some to another Jordan of Saxony, a hermit of St. Augustine, several matters a and grammatical works, many published sermons, a beautiful account of the commencement of the Dominican Order, and the life of St. Dominic. By some authors the office of the feast of St. Dominic is attributed to him, but it would seem probable that it was written by a Dominican Dominican, Bishop of Urbeztano.

But his greatest title to our gratitude is the great work to which he devoted all his talents and energies, the increase of the Order of Friar Preachers. When St. Dominic died there were eight provinces of the Order, those of Spain, France, Lombardy, Rome, Provence, Saxony, Hungary and England—including altogether sixty convents. Blessed Jordan added our others, Poland, Dacia, Greece and Germany, each comprising many convents. He gave the habit to more than a thousand novices, among whom were St. Raymond of Pennafort, Blessed Gonzales, Blessed Albert the Great, Hugh of St. Cher, the first Dominican Cardinal, Blessed Humbert de Romanis, Cardinal Kilwarby, Archbishop of Canterbury, Prince Garzia, son of the King of Navarre, etc. In fine, he showed himself in every way a worthy successor to St. Dominic, which is the highest praise one could possibly give him, and which he certainly would be most pleased to receive.

Protestants in Catholic Choirs.

It is a well known fact that Church authorities are not always placed in circumstances that would enable them to select its subjects to do their singing during divine service. It is not unfrequently the case that normal Catholics, or those accepted as such are employed as organists or choristers. Now we know that the ritual chants of the Catholic Church are precisely prayers. But how can a person pray that does not believe, or how can a musician come one Catholic Church music, i.e., interpret the Word of God by musical sound, who is devoid of faith?—Pacific.

Rules of Health for Married Women.

Get up at three o'clock in the morning, clean out the stove, sift the ashes, sweep the front sidewalk, scrub the front steps, quiet the baby, put the mackeral to soak, build the fire, grind the coffee, get out your husband's things to warm, see the shirt aired, boil the mackerel, settle the coffee, set the table, rouse the house, carry up some hot water for shaving the gentleman of the house, and dry the morning paper. Try this time you will have an appetite for breakfast. Hold the baby during breakfast, and wash the breakfast cold. After breakfast wash the dishes, nurse the baby, dust everything, wash the windows, dress the baby (that pantry wants cleaning out and scrubbing) draw the baby in his wagon for an hour or two for the benefit of his health, nurse him when you return, put on the potatoes and the cabbage (mind the baby) and the corn beef, dandle the baby to keep him from fretting, and the corned beef boils over, throw himself in a chair and wants to know why in the world you cannot cook things like his mother, as your husband learns in three hours, throw a chair and wants to know why in the world you cannot cook things like his mother, as your husband learns in three hours, throw himself in

FOREICN CATHOLIC NEWS.

Mgr. de Segur died, holding the same indulgenced crucifix which had received the dying embraces of his grandfather, his father, his mother, and his sister, as saintly Religious.

—The recent offerings of Peter-pence on the part of Spanish pilgrims to Rome were numerous, and the sum of ninety thousand francs was presented from the diocese of Barcelona alone.

—The German papers announce the death of an excellent Catholic, Herr Iabert, of Wiesbaden. He was President of the Nassau Society of St. Vincent of Paul, and was a valiant strength for Catholic interests. May he rest in peace.

—On Trinity eve the Rev. Hugh Gallagher, of San Francisco, and the Rev. Dennis Sullivan, of Newark, were ordained priests by the Cardinal Vicar in St. John Lateran. Both gentlemen were students of the North American College.

—It is noted as a curious fact that according to the returns of the last Census more marriages have taken place within the last ten years between Protestants than between Catholics in Ireland.

—A scandalous outrage was recently perpetrated in the Church of St. Ambrose, in Marseilles. As the sacred elements were being borne down one of the aisles by a priest, the congregation kneeling, a man suddenly rushed from behind a pillar, struck the priest thrice with his clenched fist, and then, snatching the monstrance containing the sacrament from his hands, dashed it violently to the ground, where it was broken in pieces. The offender was immediately pinioned and held until the arrival of the police. Deplorable scenes of this description have occurred in other parts of France.

—The Pontificate of Leo XIII, like to that of Pius V, will be rendered illustrious by the glorification of a large number of saints raised to the honor of the altars amongst the many causes now in course of investigation, or about to be considered by the Congregation of Rites, is that of the cause of the cultus given ab immemorabili to Saint Hilarion, priest and martyr of Epulum, in the Diocese of Rodez, France. The cultus of this saint, who lived in the days of Charlemagne, was a disciple of the celebrated Alcuin, and was martyred by the Saracens, has continued through the centuries, and is still flourishing in his native country.

—The city of Reggio (Emilia), where the great astronomer, Father Secchi, S. J., was born, is about to raise a monument to his memory. This monument is to take the form of a monster telescope which will be made like that lately erected in Vienna, and will have glasses seventy centimetres in diameter. Many scientific men will contribute to the fund for the erection of this telescope. The Jesuits, who were dispersed, on the death of Father Secchi, of their observatory at the Roman University, have now constructed another observatory in the villa on the high ground above the church of Sto. Spirito in Sassia.

—A striking contrast between the way in which the Schismatics and Protestants in the East of Europe treat the Jews and the tolerance which the Catholic Church has always exhibited towards that race is afforded by the recent action of the Catholic Bishops in Russia and Poland during the recent agitation. The Bishop of Plock, Mgr. Ginkiewi, ordered his priests to condemn severely any outrages against the Jews and the leading members of the Synagogue there have tendered to the Bishop an expression of their grateful thanks. The Bishop of Kielce-Cracow has issued a pastoral letter dwelling on the duty of Catholics treating Jews as their neighbors with Christian kindness.

—Some excitement has been caused in Ministerial circles in Rome by the decision of the Court of Cassation with regard to the property of Propaganda. The claims of the Congregation of Propaganda had been rejected by the Courts of the first and second instance, but their decision was now reversed. The President, Commendatore Miraglia, is of opinion that the Congregation of Propaganda is purely a lay institution, founded for the purpose of advancing civilisation and morality. And he grounds his decision on the fact that the Popes founded and endowed the Congregation, not in their capacity of pontiffs, but as Temporal Sovereigns. If the Court at Ancona accepts this rendering of the law, restitution will have to be made to Propaganda for all the property of which it has been despoiled. It is to be feared that the Government will find some other reason for justifying the spoliation.

—A wedding was solemnised some little time ago at Toulouse with full Masonic rites. The place where it took place was the Temple of the Freemasons—and the Chaine d'Union, a French organ of Freemasonry, gives some details of the proceedings. Several ladies were present, and the "Brethren" were vested in the insignia of the sect. After the civil ceremonies prescribed by law had been fulfilled, one of the senior Masons pronounced an eloquent discourse on the morality of marriage, and congratulated the newly married couple on the courage with which they had tore away from the bonds of clericalism. He was followed by another worthy, who contrasted the devotedness of the life of a married woman with the selfish egotism of Sisters of Charity. Afterwards the mother of the bride urged all the young people to follow the good example set them that day, and to rescue their sisters and cousins from the enervating influence of superstition. At the close of the proceedings the bride deposited her bouquet at the feet of a statue of the Republic.

CATHOLIC NEWS IN BRIEF.

—Cardinal Newman, in an his 82d year, preached three Sundays in succession in the Oratory Church, Birmingham, and his never been in better health.

—Bishop Elder has received official notification from Cardinal Simeoni that being forth the Diocese of Nashville to belong to the province of Cincinnati instead of to that of St. Louis as heretofore.

—We learn from the Baltimore Catholic Mirror, July 2, that his grace Archbishop Gibbons dedicated the Polish church of St. Stanislaus on the Sunday previous. Right Rev. Bishop Gilmour participating in the ceremonies and preaching the English sermon in the afternoon.

—Leo XIII. has written another encyclical on the treats of the rights of peoples and the duties of rulers. He says the only safe guide to the one and sole protection of the other is the universal recognition of God and His revealed law. "Without one you can do nothing," said the Lord. Peoples and princes will learn that truth.

—Some of the Dominican Fathers driven out of Germany have settled at Venlo, in Dutch Limburg, Holland, where they have opened a school called the College of Albert the Great, to which they propose to add a philosophical and theological seminary under the invocation of St. Thomas of Aquin.

—The town of Hangsden, Maas, has given the land for a cemetery, dividing it equally between Protestants and Roman Catholics. This is said to be the first time that any public property has ever been given to Roman Catholics in New Zealand.

—The urgent representations of the Pope's physicians have caused the Cardinals to be consulted whether the Pope should not quit Rome in the Autumn. They replied that such a provisional change of residence would not imply a cessation of the imprisonment. The villa of Duke Grazioli, at Frascati, has been talked of for the Pope's temporary residence, but noting has been decided.

—The Master General of the Friar Preachers, Most Rev. Father La Rocca, O. P., accompanied, as seems, by the eminent Irish Dominican, Father Carberry, O. P., reached New York last week, by the Inman steamer. He comes to visit the various houses of the Dominican order in America. He will go to St. Joseph's Convent, Somerset, Perry Co., to preside at an election for a Provincial.

—Father Sorin's three schools in Cambridgeport, Massachusetts—St. Thomas Aquinas's College St. Mary's Academy, and St. Mary's Parochial School—were very successful during the past scholastic year, and at the commencement the other day the Mayor of the town distributed the prizes to the most deserving pupils and made a speech congratulating the pastor and his assistants, the teachers, and the parents of the children on the excellent showing made by the boys and girls.

—The Catholic Mirror reports the following deaths: Father McKeon, of Shelbina, Mo., June 5; Sister Juliette, Sister of Charity, at Mother House Madison, N. J., June 13; Sister Alana, St. Michael's Hospital, Newark, N. J., June 17; Rev. Charles Schilling, St. Louis, June 18; Rev. J. Menchen, O. S. F., Fairmount, O., June 19; Sister Ann Joseph, Sister of Charity, at Mother House Madison, N. J., June 6; Sister Ignatius, Sister of Charity, at Mother House Madison, N. J., June 12; Rev. Charles Schilling, St. Louis, June 18; Rev. J. Menchen, O. S. F., Fairmount, O., June 20—May their souls and the souls of the faithful departed through the mercy of God rest in peace.

—In commenting on Father Curci's forthcoming book, entitled "New Italy and old parties," some of our Catholic readers, or changes, misled, no doubt, by the "associated press despatches," have fallen into the trap set for them, by writing of it in terms of approval. It may be advisable, not only in Italy but elsewhere, to introduce Christian ideas into national politics, but it is both impolitic and un-Catholic for writers on the Catholic press to indulge in a fling at what is temporal sovereignty of the Roman Pontiffs or at Ultramontanism.—Tablet.

—Very Rev. Wm. Byrne, Vicar-General of the Archdiocese of Boston, has consented to take charge of St. Mary's College, Emmittsburg, Md., for a time. He does with the permission of Archbishop Williams, and at the request of Cardinal McCloskey and other distinguished alumni of that institution and without changing his relations to his own diocese. The object is to give the alumni and friends of this illustrious college an opportunity of rallying to its relief in its present temporary troubles. The steps already taken afford a fair prospect of success. About $25,000 have already been contributed as a basis of a fund with which to settle the claims of the creditors. It is the alumni throughout the United States contribute as those of New York and Maryland, it is calculated that about $75,000 can be raised.

Humors of the Irish Troubles.

The vindictive spirit shown in some of the outrages in Ireland assumes a ludicrous form. The practice of obliging bailiffs to eat the documents they have served in an instance which is reported from Moate, county Westmeath. A farmer residing near the town had the misfortune to find one of his cattle very ill. A village veterinary surgeon prescribed a copious dose of castor oil, but, unfortunately, the only vender of the drug in the neighborhood had been "Boycotted." The farmer proceeded afterwards but to lose his cow or enter the forbidden shop. He waited until nightfall, when he ventured into the shop and procured half a pint of the oil. He was not unobserved, however, and had not proceeded far on his way home when he was met by some Land Leaguers, who asked him if he did not know that Reilly's shop had been "Boycotted." He pleaded dire necessity, but in vain. The bottle was taken from him, his mouth held open, and the whole contents were drained slowly down his throat. He is not likely to incur again the penalties of the unwritten law.

The Doomed Czar.

Another attempt to take the life of the Czar is reported. The Nihilists had prepared to move the Court from Gatchina to Peterhoff, and the necessary arrangements had been completed. The journey would have been made by train to St. Petersburg, and thence by steamer to Peterhoff. At the last moment, the chief of police received an anonymous letter, advising that a strict search should be made on the Imperial yacht. Consequently, on the suspicion thus aroused, the police instituted an inquiry, the result being, that a lieutenant and two petty officers were arrested.

In the possession of the petty officers, bombs similar to those used for the murder of the late Czar, were found. The railway between Peterhoff and St. Petersburg, it is reported, is now patrolled by soldiers, who are placed ra sentinels, with fixed bayonets, at every fifty paces along the line.

PACIFIC COAST NEWS.

—The people of Yuba and Sutter counties and the southern portion of Butte have launched upon a fight for a hydraulic mining in the Courts.

—Flour is selling in Jacksonville, Oregon, at $22½ per 1,000 lbs, and eggs, 17½ cts. per dozen.

—The Woodland Democrat says the grain yield in Yolo is nearly up to the average, in quantity and quality.

—The wheat crop of Oregon, east of the Cascade Mountains, is estimated at from 1,000,000 to 1,500,000 bushels to will be exported.

—The Livermore Herald estimates the grain crop of the section about Livermore at 150,000 tons, as against 26,000 last year, and 17,000 in 1878.

—General Bidwell's Chico ranch has put on forty men in addition to the regular force, especially to pack pumps for the Chicago market. Each pump is equipped to a separate piece of paper. The fruit is much larger than the average size shipped.

—Two men were hauling a heavy steam engine from Oroville to Chico, when, on a public highway suddenly disappeared, and the machine dropped through into a mining tunnel. The county will probably have to pay the damages.

—When the Oroville gas works were carried away by the flood last Winter, a safe weighing 2,500 pounds went down the river with the building. Monday the strong box was found a mile and a half below the town embedded in the slickens.

—Last week the Modesto News gave a handsome puff to a farmer near that town for his superior watermelons, and the very next night the patch so praised was invaded and hundreds of melons stolen or destroyed. The farmer wants no more advertising.

—The Gridley Herald says a separator on a ranch near that place, which has changed positions seven times, and turned out 1,100 sacks of grain of 140 pounds each. The daily average for four days was 1,050 sacks. The paper thinks this hard to beat with a forty-inch machine.

—A tea-train collided with another on the Central Pacific Railroad the other day, near Winnemucca, Nevada, and much of the tea was scattered promiscuously. The Piutes made the most of the windfall, and some of them got away with sacks full of the material.

—Squirrels and gophers are causing greater destruction to grain in San Mateo county than was ever before known. It is no use for a few farmers to poison the pests when their neighbors refuse to co-operate, and the Gazette calls for a general law that will cover the subject.

—H. Carson, of Josephine County, Oregon, was summoned to Jacksonville the other day to attend the funeral of his wife, who had died suddenly while visiting at that place. While attending to this sad duty he was seized with pneumonia and died, leaving three children doubly orphaned.

—The San Diego Union says the expenditures of the California Southern Railroad Company already foot up $2,500,000, including the cost of material now on the way, and pending contracts. This has given new life to every industry in the country, and caused an advance in the value of real estate.

—In 1870 George Miller died in Sacramento. His widow held the title of a cemetery lot, and the body of her husband was buried in that Vicinity. Later it was found that the grave had been dug on the wrong lot, and the owner of the lot, under direction of the proper officials, had Miller's body removed to another part of the cemetery. When this occurrence became known, the widow, Peronna Miller, sued the city of Sacramento for $10,000 damages. The case dragged its weary way through the courts for several years, and on Thursday was decided in favor of the defendant. The jury could not be made to see any injury sustained by Mrs. Miller through the gentle and careful removal of her dead husband's clay from one portion to another of Mother Earth's extensive bosom. The case will probably be appealed to the State Supreme Court.

LATEST NEWS FROM IRELAND

The Land Bill in Parliament.

VIGOROUS EFFORTS OF IRELAND'S FAITHFUL REPRESENTATIVES.

Parnell's Health Endangered by Constant Vigilance.

The lessons our correspondent of the Dublin Nation sends us that portrayal the following interesting notes of the parliamentary labors of the Irish members in watching the details of the Land Bill through its tedious course in Committee of the House of Commons:

It is now many golden years ago since a Cork newspaper reporter "condensed" a speech of Dan Callaghan's by saying, "The Irish gentleman on coming forward was loudly cheered, and, in support of the resolution, said Gentlemen—or words to that effect."

I called the story to mind when Mr. Sullivan, in compliance with a notice given on Monday, made a most important and significant motion in connection with the Land Bill. He said Mr. Speaker—Laugh a Ballagh! in words to that effect.

Yes, it is a case of "Clear the Kitchen." Everything is to be suspicious of the way of the Land Bill. The House of Commons is to get at the work henceforth de die in diem that is to say, "hammer and tongs."

Not an hour too soon was this serious course taken. Here we are on the eve of "July the First," and only four clauses out fifty past the committee stage. The date I mentioned a fortnight ago, the 29th of June, is now admitted on all hands to be about the latest at which the Bill could be expected to come out with a full so important under ordinary circumstances that the Lords will be in a hurry to have it through the Commons by Thursday, the 21st of July, at farthest, and it is a downright fact that the Cabinet have resolved to keep Parliament sitting till the "Upper House" has considered the bill.

I think it right to give early warning here of a serious danger ahead of the fall. The public mind will be considerably wearied—and attendance in London of members of Parliament will have seriously fallen off by the middle of August—the Lords mangle the bill, as it is said they meant to do, "in obedience to a mandate," and very little fight left in the wearied remnant of the Commons then remaining here. I do not know the exact frequency, discussed by several thoughtful men, English and Irish, and the general conclusion is gloomy. In a thinly attended House, with a tired and worried House, at the end of an eight month's session, compromise will be the order of the day.

Harsh as it will be on Irish members, it is a simple duty to say that the Land Bill as it came with the Land Bill will be at the very end of the session. It is an "the Lords' amendments" that will be the whole battle will be won or lost.

So far about thirty of the Irish party are sticking everybody to the work. They are ready, very severe work it is. The bill being now "in committee," and nearly two thousand amendments being made, or, rather, though, no man is safe in turning his back on the place for a minute, it is almost idle to tell, from moment to moment, what amendment may be withdrawn, or what may be moved, or which any particular amendment will or will not be on. The result is, as a writer within my personal knowledge, thus sums up the case: "Amendments crowd of land between broken intervals of sleep, and the hardest worked tort quitter on the Bog of Allen, is slightly 'strike' against.

At least minutes of the Irish drudgery, generally from 1 r. m. to 2 a. m., soon tell on all the strongest constitutions. It is not the work, it is the worry, the excessive mental strain and physical exertion that make the real hardship, because no man knows what may happen, and no man can leave his place in the Irish tenants, whose fate is in the balance, can afford to take his mind off the thing and leave it there for two minutes.

The Irish party, being but few in comparison, are able to divide themselves better, and, indeed, the work among them. Moreover, they are fighting, or for their own actual interests. This work is to them no merely honorary occupation. It is "bread and butter," it is "life and death," so to speak, with every man of them.

Watching these things, day after day, and night after night, over cannot help gravely and anxiously noting the visible effects on some of the Irishmen. I am pained to say that Mr. Parnell strikes me as being fitter this moment for a health resort in the Pyrenees or on the Spa like shores of Ulrington than for the Academic atmosphere and exhausting strife of this place. Indeed, it is, I believe, the fact that one or two of the less prominent, though older, men of the party, finding the strain too severe, have decided, under the imperative orders of medical friends, to return from service at the close of the present session. It is an open secret that some of our Richard Lalors—well may they call him "Honest Richard Lalor of Tenacity"—have and feeling, have, and said broken in health, but vigorous of mind and iron-hearted as ever, toiling painfully and painfully, at their tasks, day after morning, when men, members who, weren't out of their pinafores when he was first working for Ireland, have left early on "urgent private affairs."

The truth of it is—and the fact forces itself on the attention of anyone watching the proceedings in this House—Ireland has now sent representatives to Westminster who were born on the hillsides and amidst the fields in the homes of the people—men who are the sons, or brothers, or kinsmen of Irish tenant-farmers. Themselves, therefore, watch combatants who fight for kindred and home for the lives and fortunes of those who are their kin.

Oh, what a change—what a blessed change—from the days when Tory Lord Harkwort "cowed the country, or Castlereagh Whig Counsellor Wheedles, nursed the borough, murder that hapless Ireland might be bought and sold between them!

Father Burke, O. P.,

ON THE LIFE AND LABORS OF

ST. IGNATIUS LOYOLA,

Founder of the Jesuits.

On next Sunday the Church will celebrate the Feast of one of the Saints of God, whose followers are found in every portion of the world, and who are constantly enduring the persecutions of the world, which were to be the legacy of all who became members of the Society of Jesus. At such a time we think it opportune to lay before the readers of the MONITOR one of Father Burke's most wonderful discourses, hence we append the following well-deserved tribute paid by one of the most gifted sons of St. Dominic to the memory of the founder of one of the noblest orders ever instituted in the Church of God:

"And the Lord said: This man is to me a vessel of election to carry my name before the Gentiles and kings, and children of Israel, for I will show him what great things he must suffer in my name.

Those words came from the lips of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ when He was describing the character of St. Paul, who was to go forth in His name to convert the nations of the earth "This man is to me a vessel of election, followed with my grace, and Spirit, and Word. He shall go forth, and there shall be this sign on him that the Gentiles shall see his zeal for the glory of His name. That manic shall be pained to his brow as a crown of glory." The Lord said that the people of the earth should hear the Word from his lips, and a vision of grace should spring up before him. He should suffer for His name's sake—for the sake of that name which is the glory, the love, and the message unto all nations. St. Paul was the greatest apostle, the greatest of founders of the Church, described by our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. The holy Church which was founded by the Son of God was founded not only in the faith, that she should teach the nations of the earth; but she was also founded in holiness, that she should be the prolific mother of saints. As she was founded in faith, so through the power of holiness the Church was ever able to produce saints as great as St Paul, and as powerful before nations, and who gloried as much as he did in the name of Jesus. Fifteen hundred years had passed away since the Gospel sounded in the walls of Rome, with the word of Jesus uttered by his lips, still struggling in the agonies of death. Fifteen hundred years after his death a saint great as he—great in the name that was engraved on his heart, and great in the suffering endured for the name of Jesus a second St. Paul, was given to the world in the person of St. Ignatius Loyola, whose name filled the Church with hope and resounds to day in heaven. We have come together for two purposes: first, to honor the Lord in that great saint, "Praise ye the Lord in His saints in the firmament of His power" is the word we remand. The second purpose is to consider the character, the work, and the life of that great servant of God, and to apply the example of his glorious life to our own actions and souls. We will consider the personal character of that great saint, of whose life we will listen to a brief sketch; as also of his work in the Church of God, which affords an illustration of his wonderful character of a Father is ever reflected in the sanctity and graces of His children. We should dwell upon the life of St. Ignatius that from his sanctity we might learn the secret of sanctity, and, imitating him, we might find out the way to our Lord Jesus Christ.

In the kingdom of Spain—the great, grand, magnificent mother of saints, the privileged nation, which, beyond all others, has produced founders of great religious orders—in 1491—nearly three hundred year ago—St. Ignatius was born, and at that time Martin Luther was nine years old. These two grew together under the eye of God, who sees all things. Our great saint was of proportions to his awful heroes; he grew and strengthened for the purpose of destroying, if possible, the indestructible Church of God and ruin the nations. The other grew in strength, in magnificent proportion, and splendid in body, noble in mind and soul, and ardent in devotion. He grew in greatness, and in that chivalrous nature which God made the basis of His superhuman work. He grew to combat the destruction which the arch-heretic Luther endeavored to bring on the Church of God. He was of noble birth, and came into the world surrounded with everything which that world could yield him, and for a time the youth to lend himself to the practices of the world and the "virtues" of the court. He was brought up at court, trained in courtly manners and courtly etiquette. He was educated belittingly for a man in his exalted station of life. He was given to reading stories of great deeds of valor performed by the nobles. He was generous to a fault, and knew even to rashness, and it was but natural that, when a young man, he selected the profession of arms. Then he entered himself for some years to all the hardships of a soldier's life. He was admired by his fellow-officers for his great daring. No forlorn hope or lodgement city had terrors for him; he gloried to stand in the breach, and for his great bravery his fellow-soldiers loved and admired him. There was in him a singular combination of mind and body. He had all virtues and no vices, yet he was not a holy or a devout man. All his virtues seemed the natural growth of his magnificent person. He was generous to a fault, and always gave to the poor what he had. His purity was more. No word of obscenity ever accused his lips, and on that account the reserve observed in his presence could not have been greater had a consecrated priest or holy man been present. He lived, and his love was a pure one. His ideal

THE SHAMROCK.

ST MAURICE P. TOBIN.

When April rains make flowers blow
And bring the pearly showers to light,
And clouds of color and perfume
Float from the orchards pink and white,
I see my shamrock in the rain.
An emerald spray with rain-drops set,
Like jewels on Spring's vestment,
So fair, and yet it breathes of pain.

The Shamrock on an older shore
Sprang from a rich and sacred soil
Where saint and hero lived of yore,
And where their sons in sorrow toil,
And here, transplanted, it is me
Seems weeping for the soil it left,
The shamrock that all others see
Are tears drawn from its heart bereft.

When April rain makes flowers grow
And sparkles on their tiny buds,
That in June nights will have no dew
And fill the world with scented floods,
My lonely shamrock in our land—
For the old Springtime often grieves—
Lifts its tears upon my hand.

Literary Miscellany.

Julie; or, A Friend's Devotion.

It was late one night when two travelers, tired and weary, pursued their way along the high-road of Saint Germain, and stopped at the small fashing town of Seagirt. It was a relief to the young men when they gained the little old inn of the place, whose ancient gateway told of more flourishing times, and where the other and his baggage, which, being severally appearing in great haste from the top of the stables, at least notified all the servants of a welcome guest, and were doubtlessly heartily by the rarity of its recipients.

There was but one unsuch in the little parlor, and he appeared half asleep over the embers of a clear fire, which filled a grate surrounded by tiles of a hygiene taste. The light fell obscurely upon a marked and earnest countenance not devoid of a certain degree of benignity. He watched the new comers as they entered, with attention, and withdrew his gaze from his mouth to address an occasional observation to them. These were received in a manner which invited further talk—the garrulity of age needed but slight encouragement—and there was something that suited the half-real tone which had pervaded the speech of the two young men during the last hours of their journey, in the knowledge that the personage who seemed to desire nothing better than to amuse the leisure intervening between supper and bedtime with answers to their queries, was the retired sexton of a church hard by. They had notice! the scattered graveyard which extended far along the brink of the cliff, and had been half filled by his hands with the mouldering remains whose places were indicated by the thickly-strewn tombstones.

"I remember," said the old sexton, knocking out the ashes of his pipe with a sharp click upon the mantel-shelf, "I remember when I was no higher than that joint-stool yonder, my father asked me into the church to pull the bell for the first fresh." I was to take place on the morrow, for the funeral, I mean it was the passing-bell we went to ring, for the funeral never took place after all, as I'll describe to you, if you be you'd like to hear.

"I was a hearty and tender-hearted boy in those days, and so much impression did the whole story make upon me that many's the time in after years that I have gone before the earth was shoveled upon the dead, and there my left beyond the power of all mortal aid, and laid my ear close to the coffin, and listened, with my whole heart in my mouth, to catch the sound of breathing and wailing within, and armed with a chisel and hammer, to bear any part in the recovery of a living captive.

"One of our townspeople had a daughter—an only one. Her mother, who had been a Frenchwoman, did not long survive the birth of the child. The father, entirely occupied in his business, sent the little girl across the water to a school recommended by some of his wife's relations. She used to come home at the holidays every half year, and every one that knew her liked the little thing, and prophesied wonders of her beauty and talent at some future time.

"At school, Emily Windham became acquainted with a young girl named Julie—as bright and beautiful creature, the soul of wit and gaiety. She was an orphan, and possessing but little of her father's heart or interest, Emily found a good deal in her young friend's position like to her own. Julie had been a soldier's daughter; an officer who, dying in action, bequeathed her to the care of a faithful corporal of the Grand Armee, by whom she was tenderly reared until childhood had passed. It is related that every morning the old man walked beside her pony from their little dwelling to the school where the girls were educated, fetching her home at the close of the day.

"Emily was struck by the romantic circumstances attending Julie; and congenial tastes soon developed a sincere attachment between these two young creatures. You see, gentlemen, it needs but little discernment to discover that they were linked together by the ties, if not of blood, of the closest affection; but, after all, you have little notion of the devotion of those two girls; the one supporting and strengthening the other in the isolation of their lives and circumstances.

"Emily Windham persuaded her father more than once to invite Julie over for the term of her short visits home.

"At last the time left school. It was noticed that the friends were closeted together for a considerable time on the day of their parting; that they seemed oppressed beyond their years by their enforced separation. But the old one laughed and snorted at these signs of grief, and seriously thought there was more in their attachment than the usual run of school-friendship—strong and potent as it was—to part them even one day the next as calm and undisturbed as a vast sheet of glass.

"Emily Windham had soon many lovers. Her father grew to regard her as the one precious object in the world to him and her expectations would have attracted many, even had her beauty failed to do so.

"She fixed her choice, however, upon one whom we all thought unworthy of her.

"He told her, and she believed him—for in love opposites we are ever ready to believe that which we desire—that it was herself he sought, and not the heiress to the thriving business in the market-place, but others thought differently.

"A worthless fellow, in truth, was he—one to break her tender heart, and leave her to years of weary desponding when his end was gained, and the coveted wealth at his command.

"Nevertheless, old Windham allowed himself to be persuaded to give him his daughter, and the wedding-day was settled, and everything in order for the young pair.

"Three days before that fixed—three days, mark me—Emily Windham fell ill with a disorder whose history none in the room could exactly understand.

"A few hours put her past their aid, and the whole place mourned when my father and I went shivering into the cold, echoing little church to toll the passing-bell, and the news of her death was spread by its iron tongue far and near.

"Now, listen. It was known generally that Julie had been invited to the wedding, and was unable to come, from the circumstance of being unexpectedly called in quite a contrary direction. What, therefore, was the surprise of the neighbors when a fishing smack from the opposite coast deposited, the next evening, at dusk, a young girl on the landing place of our harbor, who was known to several as the dearly-loved friend of the deceased. She walked with a firm step to the house, but pale and anxious was the countenance she raised to the window, across which the blinds and curtains were closely lowered.

"She was admitted to the presence of the broken-hearted father, and he, surprised by her sudden appearance, and under the impression that she had come intending to be present at the wedding, sought, by carefully preparing her for the truth, to ward off the expected shock. She stopped him, however.

"'I know too well, pleased, with forced composure, 'what you have to say. I came here knowing that something was wrong; a presentiment, no matter how conveyed, told me my friend was in danger. I started at once to set out at once to join her. It seems I am too late.

"'Young Stanley, Emily Windham's lover, was present. He was, as I have said, a young man of little fortune, but was strangely beautiful in their sight, and very fond of Emily. He fell in love with her in that painful moment, and it was just the power of his selfish nature to recall or subdue his passion.

"'I have,' she resumed, glancing at both her auditors, 'to inform you of a compact which I made with my departed friend. We agreed, before we parted last, that whenever one died, the survivor should watch beside her remains until they were consigned to the grave. I wish at once to enter upon the fulfillment of my duties, but once or both of you may desire to share them. Should such be the case, I can of course offer no opposition.'

"Henry Stanley was, like all selfish men, a coward. He had no taste for cheating himself even to the death, and thought pretty his companion in the watch may be. He murmured, therefore, some compliment on a friendship, which he could not understand, and quietly departed, while the grief-stricken father led his unexpected visitor to the bedside of his lost child.

"All that night and the following did Julie watch her friend's inert body.

"Mr. Windham had at last resigned himself to the fate which was running in his veins, and at Julie's representation had gone to seek, under the care of a medical student who had been strongly sympathetic in his house, some strength to sustain the anticipated distress of the funeral, which was to take place on the morrow.

"Julie sat alone in the death chamber—her heavy eyes, which, since the beginning of her watch had never known a moment's sleep, sought vainly to follow the lines of a book which she had taken to shield herself overpowering thoughts. Sad recollections despite herself, crowded upon her.

"She thought of her faithful friend, the corporal, now old and feeble, and how short they were left beyond the power of all mortal aid, and laid my ear close to the coffin, and listened, with my whole heart in my mouth, to catch the sound of breathing and wailing within, and armed with a chisel and hammer, to bear any part in the recovery of a living captive.

"One of our townspeople had a daughter—an only one. Her mother, who had been a Frenchwoman, did not long survive the birth of the child. SACRED SPOTS IN ROME.

I.

Beautiful Description of the Home of St. Ignatius.

One of the most pleasing and instructive articles in the August number of the Catholic World is M. F. Thompson's "Chambers of the Saints, in which the writer gives readers glimpses of the habitations of many of the servants of God, and thus portrays the venerated shrine where the noble Spiritual Loyola spent his days in the City of Rome.

Among the places of deep religious interest at Rome are the cells or chambers once occupied by the saints and now converted into oratories. Some of them have been left in all their primitive simplicity, others are gilded and frescoed, and hung with rich silks and paintings. But all of them are of the most touching character, and no one with a spark of religious enthusiasm can enter them unmoved. We found it delightful to visit them when they were solitary, with nothing to disturb our impressions, and pray where the saints once prayed, kneeling where they knelt, on the same cold stones, before the Madonna they loved—the figure of Christ that was clasped in their dying hands. How strange it seemed to press our feet on the very pavement once trod by those whom we had invoked and saw in the sacred recesses of the far-off churches of the New World, to open one door after another their saintly hands once touched, to lay hold, as it were, on the ladder by which they ascended to heaven, and to breathe the fragrance they left on this lower air.

Among the most interesting of these rooms are those of St. Ignatius de Loyola, the illustrious founder of the Jesuits. He is a great saint of every land. Spain gave him birth, in France he prepared himself for his work and met his first associates. Rome set its seal on his mission. Every part of the world has experienced his influence and been watered by the blood of his followers. His rooms, still preserved intact, are in the religious house of the Gesu, now appropriated by the Italian government and used as a barrack, with the exception of these sacred rooms. They are four in number, and entered from a loggia covered with frescoes of the life of St. Ignatius by Pozzi, a lay brother of the order, celebrated for his skill in perspective, who lived in the eighteenth century. In the antechamber are doors, a fire-place, and a window of the saint's time. This opens into a small room where St. Ignatius wrote the Constitutions of his order. Here the Holy Spirit descended upon him like a flame. Opposite the altar is a statue of him clothed in sacerdotal garments he used to wear—berretta, stoles, stole, an alb of coarse lace, gray with age, and a white chasuble that became dilapidated by time and was repaired by the Archduchess Mary Anne of Austria in the year 1696. The hair is worn—note, for portraits show more wholesale devastations of relic-hunters by a wise nation. There is a small balcony before the window, as in the saint's time. He loved to come here to breathe the pure air and look up at the sky, and would often exclaim, "How vile the earth appears when I contemplate the heavens!" The buildings are now so close that you can only see a patch of blue sky. In this cell did Layner, the second general of the order.

The antechamber also opens into a room in which two saints died—St. Ignatius and St. Francis Borgia, third general of the society. It must not be supposed there were any of the elegances of the modern oratory—divine in their room, though the former spent his youth at the proud court of Spain, and the latter was the Duke of Gandia and a kinsman of the Emperor Charles V. There were no luxurious armchairs or sofas, or soft raiment, or rich carpets, or rare knick-knacks. A bed, a table, a chair or two, composed the furniture of their austere cell, and of what character may be seen from the simple pine chest against the wall that belonged to St. Ignatius. The room is low and narrow, with only one window. The walls, in their time bare, are now hung with crimson damask and paintings, some of great effect; but, as in all the rooms, the beams across the ceiling are left unpainted. The spot is pointed out where St. Ignatius breathed his last, July 31, 1556, with the holy name of Jesus on his lips—the name borne and glorified by his order. Here is the same door by which he entered and left the room; the same brick tiles pave the floor. On the wall is the solemn covenant by which he and his first companions bound themselves to live under the holy vows of evangelical perfection, signed by himself, St. Francis Xavier, Laynez, Salmeron, Bobadilla, and all those first patriarchs of the order. The altar in the room has on it the same stone of sacrifice which St. Ignatius used, and there is the painting of the Holy Family before which he often officiated, and which he wished to have beside his bed when dying. Here St. Charles Borromeo offered his first Mass. St. Francis de Sales and Mass there several times when in Rome. St. Vincent de Paul came here to pray. St. Philip Neri frequently came here to hold converse with St. Ignatius, who was his intimate friend. St. Francis Borgia, who recupied this room several years, here received St. Stanislaus Kostka into the order. St Aloysius was afterwards received here by Claudius Aquaviva, fifth general of the order. From the walls look down the saintly faces—all authentic portraits—of St. Philip Neri, St. Francis Borgia, St. Charles Borromeo, St. Francis de Sales, the noble face of St. Ignatius himself a face which St. Philip Neri said was resplendent with celestial light reflecting the interior beauty of his soul and which no painter could ever produce an exact likeness of, because no pencil she walked up, him, and cheerful, to the great comfort and exhilaration of the first five hundred pilgrims. These at once sang the "Magnificat" in thanksgiving to the immortal Mother, who overshadowed to give them such a welcome of favor at their very arrival. It was about eleven o'clock in the moonlight.

The hour was the afternoon, being the recitation of the Rosary.

ANOTHER SCENE AND THE LIGHTNING

took place. A third one happened in the following day. These are mentioned as the principal ones, though eleven entries were obtained by the Pope, and each one presents a singular fact connected during that same pilgrimage.

A very sick woman insisted on coming to Lourdes, to obtain her cure, or her death. It might be said, she obtained both, for she was seen jumping from the little wheelchair which carried her. She walked, and those present shouted "Ave Our Lady of Lourdes!" Her husband, a soldier, clasped her over this Christian woman, she knelt down and asked all to pray for the conversion of sinners. Immediately the Rosary is recited with outstretched hands, in the form of a cross, and, amidst these supplications, the woman, sinking gradually, receives a last absolution, and breathes out her soul near the Shrine of the Immaculate.

The Prefect of the Department was present at this last scene. If he needs to be converted, he will have had his share of charitable prayers. It is more likely he will have felt rather inclined to reject the death, rather mysterious in one way of the happy Christian woman, than the permanent miraculous cures he may have witnessed on that occasion, for people in America should bear in mind that

MIRACLES AT MARY'S SHRINE.

Interesting Letter from an American Priest.

A correspondent of the New York Catholic Journal sends the following interesting letter from Lourdes to that paper:

LOURDES, June 27, 1881.

What can a correspondent write next from this celebrated and holy place which has not been already written? Its wonders have been published all over the world. Its unseen terrors, its soul-soothing, still, as the Immaculate Mother continues to speak in the blessed grotto of Massabielle by means of miracles straight in presence of multitudes of pilgrims flocking hither from every part of the world, it would be ungrateful and lacking of zeal not to say, as much as possible, to receive, however feebly, the heavenly and merciful voice calling all men to prayer, penance, and thereby to real joy and eternal life.

Yes, Mr. Editor, miracles that can not be denied are here of almost daily occurrence. Your correspondent would be a loss to relate all those that have been accomplished during these two months of his sojourn near this unfortunate fountain of all graces. He would rather refer to the "Annals of Our Lady of Lourdes" for the more merits of the most striking ones. Persons brought hither in the last stages of sickness, given up by the physicians, have been seen restored suddenly to complete health. As in the days of our Divine Lord, the blind see, the deaf hear, the dumb speak, the crippled and paralytic walk. Among the latter class, I have seen, on the 9th inst., Miss Marian, sister of a distinguished member of Congress. She was shown in Belgium, her native country, as not having been able to stir during twelve years, in consequence of paralysis. She had given away her dresses, under the impression she would never wear them any more.

THE MONITOR.
TWENTY-FOURTH YEAR OF PUBLICATION.
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
THURSDAY.....JULY 28.

Dr. Woodbridge on "The Ignorant Class of the Irish Population."

In last week's MONITOR we convicted Dr. Woodbridge of having maliciously made several false accusations against adopted citizens in a so-called "sermon" which he recently preached in a Presbyterian church in this city, of which he is the hired harangner, and in the present article we propose to take up another phase of his discourse, wherein he undertook to enlighten his duped disciples regarding what he venomously styled "the ignorant class" of the immigrants coming from Ireland.

In order that the friends of Dr. Woodbridge may not think that we manipulate his expressions on the occasion referred to, we quote his language as we find it in Pirley's Popery hating periodical—i. e. fit never through which the filth and falsehoods of such sectarian bigots find a way to the reading public:

"Speaking recently of the comparative progress of the Church and Catholic faith in this country, Dr. Woodbridge gave the following remarkable statistics: 'In the year 1800 we had a population of 5,308,483. Of that number, 364,872 were members of Evangelical Churches. Last year we had 50,152,866 inhabitants, an increase of nearly ten-fold. But our present membership in the Evangelical Churches is 19,095,964, an increase of nearly thirty-fold in eighty years. Two things make this increase still more remarkable. We have had an immense Roman Catholic immigration, a large proportion of which are from the most ignorant class of the Irish population. The Roman Catholic population in the United States in 1800 was about 100,000. In 1860 it was above 4,000,000. It should, however, be stated that the census of the Roman Catholics includes all the members of their families, while the Evangelical census includes only communicants. The total of persons included in Evangelical families is about 30,000,000. If the Roman Catholics had retained all the immigrants of their denomination, with their children, they should now be 20,000,000. They have not 7,000,000 all told. Where are the 13,000,000?'

These statistics are very properly styled "remarkable," and we shall convince every impartial reader that they are indeed "remarkable" for their want of truth, when we have stripped them of the Presbyterian garb which Dr. Woodbridge has cast around them. It has often been said that "figures will not lie," but even this seeming impossibility has been easily overcome by prejudiced persons whose rancor respects neither facts nor figures so long as they can be made the tools wherewith to cover with calumny the Church of God and her most faithful children—"the ignorant Irish." In this respect Dr. Woodbridge is a "doctor" indeed, because he has "doctored" the statistics with a dose of falsehood very popular in the Presbyterian pharmacopeia. The Doctor boasts that membership in the Evangelical Churches has increased thirty fold in eighty years, yet, by some unaccountable fatality, there are more reverend rascals, more sanctimonious scoundrels, more Bible-raised dead-beats in any single community at the present day than there was in the whole country eighty years ago! From this well-known fact, the Doctor must admit that membership in an Evangelical synod is no criterion whereby to judge of the Christian character of such individuals, as we have many examples from the Reformation days down to the psalm-singing Giteau, the would-be assassin of the President, that the profession of Protestantism by any given number of people is no index to the morals, the honesty, or the virtues of any community. People may be what the world calls "respectable" and all that, but when the penetrating optic of Providence reveals the germs of child murder, the leprosy of lust, and the brands of blasphemy which are burned into their souls by the scething branding-iron of Satan—then, indeed, the cloak of their professed Christianity falls to the ground, and even the sinful world averts its lascivious eyes in horror at the spectacle! In this view of the case, Dr. Woodbridge's statistics are merely worthless ciphers, without a single unit to give them strength or numerical significance.

Having thus disposed of the Evangelical errors of Dr. Woodbridge, let us consider his assertions regarding the Catholic side of the question, wherein the Doctor sought to delight the ears of his Evangelical lambs by assuring them that Catholics were actually on the decrease in this country! But we can assure the purblind preacher that he need not lay such flattering unction to his soul, as Catholics have the promises of Christ that their Church should never fail; and, besides this spiritual strength, we have statistics that have not been doctored by prejudice, and from which we propose to show Dr. Woodbridge the gradual increase of the Church in America during the past century, even at the risk of cholera-Catholicism to the unbelieving Presbyterian preacher!

We will begin with the memorable year of 1776, when the Irish, the French, the Poles, and other Catholic nationalities, combined their Catholic valor and treasure in order to wrest from this land of Protestant England and the ancestors of the Wesleys, Woodbridges, and other Tories, from that time to the present. In 1776 the population of America was estimated at 3,000,000, the Catholic proportion being 25,000, or one in 120 of the grand total. In 1790 the population was 3,280,000, and the Catholics increased to 1 in 167 of the whole population. In 1800 the population rose to 5,300,000, and the Catholics numbered 100,000, or one in 53. In 1810 the population was 7,200,000, Catholics 150,000, or one in 48. In 1820, the population was 9,600,000, Catholics 300,000, or one in 32. In 1830 the population was 13,000,000, Catholics 600,000, or one in 21. In 1840 the population was 17,000,000, Catholics, 1,500,000, or one in 11. In 1850 the population was 23,200,000, Catholics 3,500,000, or one in 7. In 1860 the population was 31,500,000 Catholics 4,500,000, or one in 7. In 1870 the population was 42,000,000, the Catholics numbering 7,000,000, or one in every 6 of the population. There, Doctor! This is, no doubt, a bitter dose to swallow, but, nevertheless, your Presbyterian stomach must accept it as the only cure for your anti-Catholic rabies.

But it is not alone in membership that the Church has kept pace with the growth of the country, as the same ratio of increase is notable in her material property, as we learn from the Census Reports. Thus, for instance, in 1850 the total property valuation of the United States was $7,135,780,228; in 1860 it was $16,159,616,068; in 1870 it was $30,068,518,507. These figures show an increase of about 125 per cent. from 1850 to 1860, and about 86 per cent. from 1860 to 1870. Now, let us turn to the statistics concerning the valuation of the property held by the Catholic Church during these periods, and we have that in 1850 it was $9,256,758; in 1860 it was $26,774,310; in 1870 it was $60,985,565. These figures show that the aggregate wealth of the Catholic Church increased about 189 per cent. from 1850 to 1860, and about 128 per cent. from 1860 to 1870. That is to say, in the first of these two decades the wealth of the whole country increased 125 per cent.; the Catholic Church gained 189 per cent.; and in the second decade the Church increased 128 per cent., against 86 per cent. as demonstrated by the increased wealth of the entire country.

Is Dr. Woodbridge yet satisfied at the showing we make against the miserable misrepresentations he made to his Presbyterian pewholders? If not as another evidence of the increase of the Church in this land discovered by Catholics—we can readily cite him to the fact that up to 1820 there was only one Archbishop in this country, against fifteen that we have at present! Bishops have increased from two in 1800 to sixty in 1880; Dioceses have increased from one in 1800 to sixty-three in the present year, Priests have increased from fifty in 1800 to six thousand five hundred at present; Churches have multiplied from eighty in 1810, to nearly six thousand in the present year; and our colleges and schools now number more than three thousand against a solitary three eighty years ago!

It has been well said that "out of evil good may come," and we heartily thank Dr. Woodbridge for his exhibition of fanaticism, inasmuch as it has enabled us, not only to upsetch the Doctor's statistics, but also to show the enemies of the Church in general how hopeless is their war against a Church supported by the omnipotent arm of God.

Dr. Woodbridge is curious to know what has become of the missing 13,000,000 which he asserts should belong to the Church to-day if all the immigrants and their families had been held within the fold of Christ. Well, for the Doctor's edification and delight, no doubt, we will inform him that many of these baptized Catholics have renounced their baptismal vows and forsworn their allegiance to God through the infidel instruction they received in the public schools. These apostates are not to be found, however, among the members of any Evangelical sect, but they belong to the grand army of Nothingarians, one of the most numerous bodies in the country. Like their parents before them, these people were Catholics originally, but the Satanic schools to which their parents committed them completely covered their Christianity with a coating of materialism, and then concerting with people without conscience or a belief in God, turned them into the liberalistic spawn of scoffers which they are at the present day. If Protestantism has gained anything by this change, if society is benefitted by this sacrifice of faith at the shrine of Satan, then, indeed, Dr. Woodbridge and all other preachers are welcome to the glory it endows upon them, but may the Lord have mercy upon those Catholic parents who thus plunged the souls of their children into the pit of perdition!

This accounts for a moiety of the Doctor's 13,000,000 missing Catholics, and, to find the rest of them, the Doctor will have to seek in the cemeteries where rest the bodies of the Catholic heroes who gave their lives for their adopted country, while such clerical cravens as calumniate the Catholic Church were secreting themselves from the Provost Marshals in dread of the draft! Give back to the Church—ye bigots! the lives of her noble, martyred sons who have been slaughtered in defence of the glorious principles of freedom, ere you assail that Church with the fury of a fanaticism that bespeaks you the base-born slaves of some effete tyranny, rather than the sterling sons of a land that proclaims equal liberty to all men! Catholics discovered this land. Catholics saved it from being made the slave-pen of English monarchs. Catholics died in order that the title-deeds of freedom might not be torn in twain—and yet, notwithstanding the heroism recorded on every page of history, there are worthless Woodbridges in our own day who have the hardihood to stand up in their pulpits and praise about "the ignorant class" of a portion of our population who have helped, more than the native-born themselves, even, to make this nation an invincible phalanx of freemen whose influence is world-wide, and whose principles of government are founded upon the strongest tenets of the Church of God. Dr. Woodbridge, farewell! Let your future acts prove

That repentance has turned your hate into love.

Pirley on the Scribes.

It is a singular fact that all the enemies of Christianity—from Rembal to Pirley—were haters of the Jesuits. The former caused their expulsion from Portugal, and the latter desires to see them expelled from America so he can help to despoil them of their property and destroy the schools and churches they have erected. Pirley allows no occasion to pass that he does not pour the vials of his vicious wrath upon the inoffensive heads of men whose holiness of life is a marked contrast with the vile career of their malicious persecutor. No later than last week Pirley took occasion to malign the Jesuits, and in doing so he exhibited his usual ignorance of historical facts as well as re-established his reputation as the most reckless falsifier on the Pacific coast. Take, for instance, this statement:

"It is also a fact that it is the Roman Catholic Church that finds in this [the Jesuit] Order an most dangerous enemy!"

What kind of a fanatical fool is this man who can pen such paragraphs as truth and pass them off for facts! Is it possible that there are people in California who allow themselves to be duped by such a disreputable and demented detractor? The Jesuits the enemies of the Catholic Church! Why, there are insane people in the Stockton lunatic asylum with sense sufficient to contradict such an asinine assertion as this! Poor Pirley! We really fear that his Paperophobia is driving him crazy and that he will die under the hallucination that the Jesuits killed him because he was a Jew!

And this is the mental pabulum our "educated classes" feed upon in the weekly swill-tub of fanatical Frank! What a parody upon the boasted "enlightenment" of the American people, and what a commentary upon their vaunted common sense!

True to his anti-Christian and sanctious nature, Pirley hates the Jesuits because they are "growing in numbers and in wealth, building magnificent public edifices, making a display of power, interfering with our public schools, and prominent members of the Land League." (!!!) Hence they have to be mangled every week in the shop-board a butchering bigot. The magnificent church of St. Ignatius is an eye-sore to scorpions of the Pirley species. Jesuit schools and colleges are abominations in the eyes of all enemies of religion, because they see in them the temples of knowledge whereby the world is to be saved from the meshes of materialism by the sign of the Cross. Hence these infidels hate the Jesuits because they are the exponents of Christianity in a land where the name of Christ is known to many only as the by-word of blatant blasphemy. If the Jesuits would cease to put in practice the Christian counsels of St. Ignatius and join the cohorts of infidelity, how the world would ring with plaudits for their wisdom and their worldly wealth, but because they erect magnificent temples for the worship of Almighty God, and build spacious school-houses wherein to implant Christianity in the hearts of the rising generation, then they must be hounded to death by diabolical knaves whose only creed is the crucifixion of Christianity and all who uphold it.

One of the favorite falsehoods indulged in by the enemies of the Jesuits is repeated by rancorous Pirley in his latest ebullition of wrath when he undertakes to tell his readers that "The Church of Rome considered the annihilation of the Jesuits. Popes have arrayed themselves against this Society." This charge is only an old calumny, and we as well answer it once for all. If existence now, so as to show fanatical Frank how little he knows about the truth of history. Briefly then, the history of the suppression of the Jesuits by Pope Clement XIV., was brought about by the corrupt philosophers and duped monarchs of the last century, who sought to injure the Church by first destroying a Society which they plainly perceived was her most obedience to their behests. So active were the Jesuits in their hostility to the enemies of religion in those days that they were styled the "Janissaries of the Pope," but finally designing demagogues secured the influence of a few weak-minded rulers such as Joseph of Portugal, Louis XV., of France, and Charles II., of Spain, who threatened Pope Clement XIII. with all sorts of calamities unless he caused the suppression of an Order that neither tyrants nor traitors to the Church could control. But Clement XIII. replied to the requests of the monarchs named by refusing to accede to their insolent demand, and he issued several Bulls and Briefs in which he declared the Jesuits innocent of the charges brought against them, and also defended their Order. Disappointed and exasperated by the result of their application to Rome, the Governments next resorted to violence in order to carry out their determined hostility; they forcibly took possession of the churches, houses and property of the Society, killing several Jesuits, imprisoning others, and driving the remainder into exile. They next sent an army of invasion into the Pope's territory and robbed him of a portion of his temporal kingdom. Not satisfied with this, they even threatened a schism from the Church, unless the Pope would accede to the wishes of the Jesuit-hating hordes. But Clement XIII. never flinched from his position in the cause of right, and the soldiers of Christ against the banditti of Heliobluff.

When Clement XIV. ascended the Pontifical throne, the enemies of the Society at once assailed him on all sides to suppress the Jesuits, and he, fearing a threatened schism, and menaced by domestic traitors and foreign foes, consented to suppress the Society, upon the principle of choosing the lesser of two evils. But the language of the Bull of Suppression is sufficient proof that the Pontiff did not believe the Jesuits guilty of the crimes imputed to them by the rabble that assailed them. And history tells us that this holy Pontiff, when it came to sign the Bull of Suppression, exclaimed "Obsequium feci, compulsus feci." The new Pontiff, Pius VI., authorized the institution of the Society in Russia, and his successor extended their re-establishment throughout the whole world.

The Jesuit Order still lives and flourishes, but let us see how it fared with a few of their persecutors. The King of Naples lost part of his dominions. Louis XV.—died full of remorse, and his son, Louis XVI., expiated his father's crime on the scaffold. The members of the house of Braganza had to fly into exile; Charles IV., of Spain, was doomed to perpetual exile for his father's participation in the persecution. Austria, under Joseph II., was disintegrated and humbled. Charles X. drove the Jesuits out of France, and, in turn, became himself an exile. Louis Philippe was their enemy, and he only escaped assassination by fleeing from his country disguised as a servant. Napoleon III died in exile, and the sad fate of his son and widow are yet fresh in the minds of our readers. Thus we learn from history that Providence metes out its vengeance upon the heads of those who dare to assail His chosen soldiers who are constantly engaged in a warfare with a world under the celestial enflamme similbalanced with the heavenly legend "Ad majorem Dei gloriam."

Whole catacombs of charges have been brought against the Jesuits since the beginning of their first organization, but none of them have ever been proved. Time and again the members of the Society have clamored for judicial investigation in order to purge themselves from the calumnies uttered by their enemies, but the only reply to the reasonable request has been the ostracism of exile or death. As it was in the beginning so will it be to the end. Parasites of the press will continue to invent calumnious charges against the Jesuits, the infidel horde of every clime will conspire for their destruction—but so long as this grand Society continues to be "the right arm of the Apostolic See," as Pope Clement VIII called them, they may expect that their only reward from the world will be persecution for Christ's sake, at the hands of those haters of Christianity who have eyes and see not, who have ears, and hear not.

English Spies Concert Another Fenian Scare.

It is an open secret that England has a posse of police detectives in New York who are ostensibly there for the purpose of watching Irish Nationalists and reporting their movements to Dublin Castle, the pose of assisting the cause of Ireland in her present struggle for freedom from landlord oppression. Those blood-hounds of John Bull are notoriously the concoctors of all the so-called "Fenian outrages" which are so constantly telegraphed from England, and we are glad to learn that these miscreants have recently been caught in one of their most flagrant and diabolical plots to cast odium upon the Irish cause. It appears, from recent telegrams, that a number of barrels of cement were shipped from New York and landed at Liverpool, but the fact that each barrel was marked with a large black cross, attracted the attention of the customs officers, who suspected a plot, and on opening one of them to contain infernal machines made after the Thomas pattern. By preconcerted arrangement between the British authorities and their New York spies, the English officers had been advised of the shipment, and when the matter came up in the British Parliament it created very little excitement because the whole scheme was so transparent, that only the pensioned agents of British money could place credence in it. It was reported "outrage," and it was currently believed that the English spies in New York were the instigators and active agents in the perpetration of this latest ruse to raise the animosity of the American people against the cause of Ireland's liberty. In order to throw suspicion on the Irish party in New York, the English detectives placed some Nihilistic cipher letters in the barrels, and each barrel, let Rosa publicly denies any knowledge of the shipment of such machines, and adds that the very fact of such evidence being placed in the packages, without his knowledge, proves it to have been the work of English detectives who want to keep up the excitement in order to retain their situations as spies in America.

English spies are capable of the most degrading acts in order to keep up English supremacy in Ireland, and as America is the land from whence Ireland receives most sympathy and succor, we may naturally expect that the detectives of England will stoop to the most despicable means in order to turn the tide of popular favor from the Irish cause. A nation that has to resort to such means in order to forge the chains of tyranny upon an impoverished, starving people, is deserving of the execration of every man who cherishes the spirit of freedom and who desires to see the principles of civil and religious liberty the universal creed of all peoples.

It has been well said that "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty," and we hope that the Irish element in America will rally around their noble name such protective means as will guard it from the designs of detectives, or the equally dangerous enemy designing political demagogues who seek to use it for their own base purposes.

A Word to Some Meddlesome Newspapers.

The Catholic Church is ever afraid of the criticisms of the press upon the conduct of her priests when in the discharge of their sacerdotal duty. Not has the Church any desire to withhold the doctrines she declares upon spiritual things from the whole world. All the world is invited to her teachings, will he, nill he itself, whenever they set out in earnest or to comment on her discipline. It is by no means commendable on the part of the Dailies of this city, or the Times of Oakland, to print such falsehoods upon Catholic education as they did this week in relation to the new schools recently established by Rev. Michael King in Oakland, preparing which the Chronicle of Tuesday last contained the following item:

WITH THREE ASSISTANTS.

Last Sunday, at the church of the Immaculate Conception, in Oakland, Rev. Father King gave notice to his parishioners that he would deny all ex-aide. Leon Phillippe was their enemy, and he only escaped assassination by fleeing from his country disguised as a servant. Napoleon III died in exile, and the sad fate of his son and widow are yet fresh in the minds of our readers. Thus we learn from history that Providence metes out its vengeance upon the heads of those who dare to assail His chosen soldiers who are constantly engaged in a warfare with a world under the celestial enflamme similbalanced with the heavenly legend "Ad majorem Dei gloriam."

Whole catacombs of charges have been brought against the Jesuits since the beginning of their first organization, none of them have ever been proved. Time and again the members of the Society have clamored for judicial investigation in order to purge themselves from the calumnies uttered by their enemies, but the only reply to the reasonable request has been the ostracism of exile or death. As it was in the beginning so will it be to the end. Parasites of the press will continue to invent calumnious charges against the Jesuits, the infidel horde of every clime will conspire for their destruction—but so long as this grand Society continues to be "the right arm of the Apostolic See," as Pope Clement VIII called them, they may expect that their only reward from the world will be persecution for Christ's sake, at the hands of those haters of Christianity who have eyes and see not, who have ears, and hear not.

English Spies Concert Another Fenian Scare.

It is an open secret that England has a posse of police detectives in New York who are ostensibly there for the purpose of watching Irish Nationalists and reporting their movements to Dublin Castle, the pose of assisting the cause of Ireland in her present struggle for freedom from landlord oppression. Those blood-hounds of John Bull are notoriously the concoctors of all the so-called "Fenian outrages" which are so constantly telegraphed from England, and we are glad to learn that these miscreants have recently been caught in one of their most flagrant and diabolical plots to cast odium upon the Irish cause. It appears, from recent telegrams, that a number of barrels of cement were shipped from New York and landed at Liverpool, but the fact that each barrel was marked with a large black cross, attracted the attention of the customs officers, who suspected a plot, and on opening one of them to contain infernal machines made after the Thomas pattern. By preconcerted arrangement between the British authorities and their New York spies, the English officers had been advised of the shipment, and when the matter came up in the British Parliament it created very little excitement because the whole scheme was so transparent, that only the pensioned agents of British money placed any reliance upon it. It was reported "outrage," and it was currently believed that the English spies in New York were the instigators and active agents in the perpetration of this latest ruse to raise the animosity of the American people against the cause of Ireland's liberty. In order to throw suspicion on the Irish party in New York, the English detectives placed some Nihilistic cipher letters in the barrels, and each barrel, let Rosa publicly denies any knowledge of the shipment of such machines, and adds that the very fact of such evidence being placed in the packages, without his knowledge, proves it to have been the work of English detectives who want to keep up the excitement in order to retain their situations as spies in America.

Things We Don't Like to See.

We are not at all captious in our Catholic feelings, but we must say that we do not like to see Eastern Catholic papers advertising St. Joseph's Liniment, St. Patrick's Pills, St. Peter's Patent Plasters, or St. Vincent's Vermifuge. We feel that it degrades the name of a saint to have it connected with some quack nostrum, fulminated by some Connecticut Yankee who thinks he can swindle Patrick or Bridget out of a dollar by labeling his vile mixture with the exalted name of the patron of the universal Church. Catholic journals like the Revue, and many other prominent papers, should not permit such charlatans to prostitute their columns with soliciting advertisements of a character of this kind.

Better, far better, do without the dollars such patent-page hringers than to insult the venerated name of a great light of the Church and a member of the Church triumphant whose intercession we implore—by advertising a quack nostrum in order to impose upon Catholics by foisting upon it some image sacred to them. If the financial needs of our Eastern contemporaries are so urgent this style of salvation are so irksome as to require them to take all fish that come to the publisher's net, we think some good priest or some practical Catholic can be found in every community, who will pay a stipulated sum weekly, if necessary, in order to keep the names of the saints of the Church from being made the trade-marks of tinkeries, and presented weekly to the gaze of Catholics in a form that should not permit such insults to be imposed upon them. This is one of the things we don't like to see in our Eastern contemporaries, and we hope we are not alone in our desire to see the degradation of the names of the saints of God.

Threats Against the Pope.

Telegrams from Rome bring the sad intelligence that demonstrations against religion are of almost daily occurrence. The infidels have subscribed a fund for the purpose of giving a public cremation of the last Pius IX., allusion to which appeared in our issue of last week. Another telegram informs us that the Pope's life is threatened by the Italian Government, and that the Pope has made the most pathetic appeal to the Catholic world in behalf of his temporal rights. The Pope's Encyclical, addressed to the Catholics of Italy, has caused the greatest excitement throughout the Italian Peninsula, and it is feared that the "Guarantees" of the Italian Government will be broken in the attempt to carry out the decrees of the Vatican Council

Farm and Home.

Questions for Maried Farmers.

Who has cooked your meals, made, washed and mended your clothes all these years? Who made the butter and cheese that you sold and pocketed the money for? Who took care of your children, nursed you when you were sick, and bore with your outrageous fault-finding when things didn't go to suit you? Who patched, and darned, and contrived, and saved, and made every dollar do the work of three? And what has she had to pay her for all this? Just her board and clothes as she went along, and if you were to die to-morrow all that she could claim of the property that she worked so hard to help you save would be the use of one third of the real estate; and in nine cases out of ten that is literally worse than nothing. If it had not been for your wife's help, would you have been worth so much to-day as you are now? If you had been obliged to hire a woman to do the work that your wife has done or her board and clothes, do you imagine that you could have done much more than make both ends meet?

A Wife's Prayer.

If there is anything comes nearer to the implication of Ruth to Naomi than the subjoined, we have not seen it: "Lord! bless and preserve that dear person whom thou hast chosen to be my husband. Let his life be long and blessed, comfortable and holy; and let me also become a great blessing and a comfort unto him, a shaver in all his joys; a refreshment in all his sorrows, a balm unto his wounds, a cheerer in the accidents and changes in the world; make me amiable forever in his eyes, and forever dear to him. Unite his heart to me in the dearest love and holiness, and mine to him in all sweetness, charity, and compliance. Keep me from all ungentleness, all discontentedness, and unreasonableness of passions and humor; and make me humble and obedient, useful and observant that we may delight in each other according to Thy blessed word, and both of us may rejoice in thee, having our portion in Thy love and service forever."

What Men Need Wives for.

It is not to sweep the house, and make the bed, and darn the socks, and cook the meals, chiefly that a man wants a wife. If this is all he wants, hired servants can do it cheaper than a wife. If this is all, when a young man calls to see a lady, send him into the pantry to taste the bread and cakes she has made; send him to inspect the needle-work and bed-making, or put a broom into her hands and send him to witness its use. Such things are important, and the wise young man will quietly look after them.

But what the true man most wants of a wife is her companionship, sympathy and love. The way of life has many dreary places in it, and man needs a companion to go with him. A man is sometimes overtaken by misfortunes. He meets with failure and defeat; trials and temptations beset him; and he needs one to stand by and sympathize. He has stern battles to fight with poverty, with enemies and with sin, and he needs a woman that, while he puts his arms around her and feels that he has something to fight for, will help him fight; that will put her lips to his ear and whisper words of counsel, and her hand to his heart and impart new inspirations.

All through life—through storm and through sunshine, conflict and victory, through adverse and favoring winds—man needs a woman's love. The heart yearns for it. A sister's or a mother's love will hardly supply the need. Yet many seek for nothing further than success in housework. Justly enough, half of these get nothing more. The other half, surprised above measure, have obtained more than they sought. Their vives surprise them by assuming a nobler idea of marriage, and disclosing a treasury of love, sympathy and love.

An Ingenious Farmer.

An ingenious farmer, sticking a few nails into a clothes line to keep his neighbors cattle out of his pasture, went about his other business, thinking no more of the matter. A sharp fellow came along, saw the rope and began to think about it. He evaded the "barbed wire" fence, and the very farmer from whom the fellow got the idea has to pay him a tribute for an article which he himself originally designed. And the income of the monopoly is estimated at $100,000 per month.

Modern Courtship.

"And you really love me dearly?" he asked, as he coiled his arm around her wasp-like system. "And you'll always love me so?"

"Always, Frederick; always so."

"And you pledge me to new but—"

"Sir?"

"You pledge me to so beautifully my life has it will always be as happy as now?"

"With my last breath, Frederick."

"And, darling, you will mind my so—"

"Your what, sir?"

"You will mind my social wave and draw me upward and onward in a better atmosphere?"

"It will be the pride of my life to do so, Frederick; I will sacrifice all for your complete happiness."

"I know that, sweetness. But suppose that in the fullness of time some accident should happen too—say the iron—"

"You forget yourself, sir. Tothe what?"

"To the ironsaxon; would it defer the love which makes you mine?"

"Never, Frederick. I am yours, mind and heart, and naught can separate us."

"But what I want to say is, that should my pant—"

"Begone, sir. What do you mean?"

"Hear me, my life. I say if my panting bosom should grow cold it; death, would your love still warm it?"

"As the sun melts the iceberg, Frederick, so would the rays of my affection thrill your heart again."

"And you will care for me ever, my soul, and I for you, for though I may never have a shirt—"

"Enough! Leave me forever."

"But listen. Though I may never have a shirking disposition, I may sometimes, perhaps, in the struggle for life, forget the plain duty."

"And I'll remind you of it, Frederick, in tender actions, and make the duties of existence so pleasant of performance that to avoid them will be pain."

And so on. Thats modern courtship. Lots of abstract swash, but a manifest disinclination to contemplate such commonplace as buttons, socks, trousers, and shirts.

Family Fun.

She Showed it Well.

They were a party of four couples coming over on the steamboat Sancelito, and the prettiest girl of the crashers looked up at Mount Tamalpais and said: "Oh that he rid mountain! I had the most frightful adventure up there last summer you ever heard of. It's amazing how I didn't get to sixty you!" Whereupon, and shamed, and contrived, and saved, and made every dollar do the work of three? And what has she had to pay her for all this? Just her board and clothes as she went along, and if you were to die to-morrow all that she could claim of the property that she worked so hard to help you save would be the use of one third of the real estate; and in nine cases out of ten that is literally worse than nothing. If it had not been for your wife's help, would you have been worth so much to-day as you are now? If you had been obliged to hire a woman to do the work that your wife has done or her board and clothes, do you imagine that you could have done much more than make both ends meet?

A Virtuous Voter.

An instance of the character of some of the Connecticut voters is told me by an ex-State Committee Chairman. It is to the effect that a Republican voter in one of the Lymes—a man worth $20,000, by the way—was induced for $20 paid him by a Democrat to agree to stay away from the polls at a certain close election. When the Republicans sent for him to come to the polls he replied

"I shall vote Democratic if I come, but really said that if they would pay him $20 he would keep away, whereupon he received the money. Next morning he went over to deposit his $40 in the Essex Savings Bank. En route he was accosted by a friend, who said

"Why did you not vote yesterday?"

His reply was "Well, I made up my mind that both parties had got so corrupt that I would keep away from the polls this year."

Severe on the Minister.

The Rochester Herald says Among the inmates of the County Insane Asylum is a man who is often perfectly sensible, and when accosted at such times causes visitors to wonder why he is confined there. This man entered into conversation the other day with a caller who wore dress prevailing him a clergyman. Said the mad man.

"It was too bad, was it not, the killing of Grant at Chicago?"

"It was," said the minister, who followed the accepted custom of assenting to the statements of lunatics for peace sake.

"Hayes was assassinated at Cincinnati, was he not?" again asked the lunatic.

"Yes, replied the clergyman.

"And was not Queen Victoria murdered in her palace? To this query from the madman the clerical visitor once more answered in the affirmative. The lunatic paused, one after another a dozen living royal personages, all of whom the clergyman was led to admit had been put out of the way. Finishing his catechism, the madman turned on the clergyman and said, Surely "Your dress shows you are a minister, but you are the worst liar I ever saw!"

—A darkey, who was stooping to wash his hands in a creek, didn't notice the peculiar actions of a goat just behind him, so, when he scrambled out of the water, and was asked how it happened, he answered "I dunno zackly, but jeared as if de shore kinder hoisted and frowed me."

Caleb's girl worked him a nice slipper for a watch case and sent it to him at his birthday. He tried it on, and then wrote back to her that if she was working at the other, for mercy's sake to make it larger, as that one was too small. She sent him a large sized mitten.

—"Judge, said a Western lawyer, "isn't it a big way to spell grammatical?" "I think so, said the Judge, "but I'll look it up in Webster's Dictionary. He fumbled over the pages for five minutes, and then said, in heat "Well, I've been a Webster" man and voted for him for President; but any man that will write a dictionary and leave out such a common word as 'sequinom' ical can't have my vote any more.

—Said Mrs. Smith, who has come to spend the day, to little Edith: "Are you glad to see me again, Edith?" Edith—"Yes m'm, and mamma's glad, too!" Mrs. Smith —"Is she? Edith—"Yes, m'm; she said she hoped you'd come to-day, and have it over. Mamma blushes scarlet, but Mrs. Smith smiles sadly, and has a far off look in her eyes.

—An Ethiopian witness in the court of justice at Virginia City, Nev., being asked his business, said: "Well, boss, I spose I might be called a miner." "If you work at mining you are, of course, a miner," said the judge. "Well, dat's wat I works at." "What kind of mining are you doing?" "De kind of mining I work at is what they calls kakemining.

A nice looking old lady with a snow face about her head, sat in a car the other day, and drew up her skirts nervously, lest the cataract of tobacco juice that was pouring from the mouths of two loafers should design upon them. "Conductor, she asked timidly, when he came in, "isn't it against the rules to spat on the floor of the car? "No ma'm, replied the gallant conductor, "spit wherever you like."

TRUSTWORTHY TESTIMONY.

Some Vital Facts Concerning the Welfare of the Community Made Public.

What Californians Say, and How Their Statements are Confirmed.

(Chronicle.)

No fact has been made more plainly manifest during the past few years than the important effect which climate has upon the health of the people of American people. The steady complaint of Europe tend to longer lives, but the influence of European climate is towards apoplectic and other similar diseases. On the other hand, the building habits of the American people generally tax the nervous system and other important portions of the body, while severe and sudden changes of the atmosphere add still more to the difficulties to be overcome.

San Francisco, as well as all cities in the all more southern latitudes, is especially subject to these difficulties, and it is proof for the strongest case, particularly at this season, when the year is drawing nearer to every one who stops to reflect. These facts are especially true with reference to the human kidneys and liver, and the alarming increase of Bright's disease and all minor Kidney difficulties has caused this subject to be a theme of almost universal conversation. Knowing some facts, and in order that our readers might be more thoroughly informed on the subject, a representative of this paper has taken pains to collect some facts and impartial testimony, which is herewith presented. Having learned of a remarkable illustration of the subject under consideration, a visit was made upon Mrs. N. H. D. Mason at 27 Lily street, when, upon being questioned, said:

"For a long time my daughter had suffered with Albuminuria, and she was treated by the best physicians in this city and in the Dalles, but they failed to afford her any relief. When odema of the lower extremities set in we were in despair, for we considered her disease incurable; in fact we felt that her case was utterly hopeless. Thinking that a change of climate might in some degree alleviate her sufferings, and being the only remaining effort that I could make in her behalf, I started with her for Southern California. While on the steamer we met with a Dr. Shower-man of New York, who earnestly recommended the use of Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure for my daughter's disease, and told of several remarkable cures that had come under his observation in the East from its use. Although strongly opposed to the use of proprietary medicines, and having but little faith in their efficacy, I was persuaded by the Doctor's faith in this remedy to at least give it a trial. She commenced to improve after taking the first three bottles, and from that time on her improvement was rapid, until we now consider her cured. Her general health is now excellent, and I feel that too much cannot be said in favor of this remarkable remedy which has done so much for her.

At the point of the interview a young lady of bright and animated appearance entered the room and addressed a few words to Mrs. Mason. After her departure Mrs. Mason said

"That was my daughter, who was once an invalid; does she look very sick now?"

The reporter expressed his surprise that a person once so hopelessly ill could ever recover such a fresh and healthy appearance, but was assured that such was the case.

"Do you feel, Mrs. Mason, that you owe her recovery entirely to the use of this remedy?"

"I do most assuredly. I do not think she could have lived six months had I not used it and so great is my faith in it that I unhesitatingly recommend it to all who are in any degree suffering from kidney or liver complaint.

"I will now then make to Mr. A. Pace, No. 1305 Leavenworth street.

"I understand, Mr. Pace, that you have had some experience regarding the effects of our Sacramento Valley, and Mr

REDPATH IN IRELAND.

(Concluded from first page.)

if not, he (Mr. Redpath) should characterise him as he ought to be characterised in the future (applause). He was asked the previous day by an English gentleman whether the American Government would surrender Rossa, and he (Mr. Redpath) said, "Yes, when they become converted to English views of things—not till then." Rossa was the bitterest enemy of the Land Leaguers paper always denounced Davitt, Dwyer, and himself. He knew him, and he did not think his policy wise—he thought it foolish and dangerous, but every man who had studied the recent history of Ireland would be lenient in his judgment of one who had suffered so much as Mr. Rossa had suffered from the English Government (applause). He (Mr. Redpath) and Why should Dynamite Rossa be considered? "Because," said the English gentleman, "he is conspiring to destroy English property." He replied, "Did you ever hear of a Scotchman named Laird who boasted in the English Parliament that he was building ships

TO BE SENT OUT TO DESTROY AMERICAN PROPERTY?

Perhaps if they let us hang him we will talk about O'Donovan Rossa. Mr. Laird's statement was cheered in the English House of Commons. They seem to think in England that Americans had no money, but they would find themselves wofully mistaken. There was no love in America for the English Government. Americans made a great distinction between the English Government. There was no ill-feeling in America, but cool feeling for the English people. If there was any friendly feeling in the United States towards the English Government he failed to discover it (applause). In conclusion he thanked them again, and assured them that the Irish in America would fully sustain them in their legal, fearless, and constitutional agitation for the rights of the people here. The meeting then terminated.

Father Weninger on Prayers for the President.

The prayers which have been offered up by every Christian community in the land for the preservation of the life of the President has aroused the ire of the infidel Ingersoll in his lectures. This fact having been brought to the notice of the veteran Jesuit missionary, Father Francis Xavier Weninger, he addressed the following letter to the Milwaukie Sentinel.

Ingersoll's silly comments on the prayers which are and have been offered up by the people of this country for President Garfield's recovery, have been published and republished by the press throughout the whole country, and expose, with cynical frivolity, his horrid infidelity in all its abominable aspects. His remarks literally verify the truth of St. Paul's saying, that the carnal man cannot comprehend spiritual things. Never yet was ever observed the behavior of a dog when, after meals, he out people rise to pray and return thanks to the Almighty! How the brute jumps up, and, with wistful eyes, gazes first at the praying viands left upon the table, and then, with almost impatient contempt, upon those who are praying—his whole countenance expressing more clearly than words, "Away with your prayers! I prefer the smallest morsel left upon the table to all the prayers of the Pope and the whole world. Well, the dog is a fit emblem of Colonel Ingersoll's behavior in regard to the matter in question. No doubt, had God created man for this life only, i.e., to enjoy the pleasures of this earth as best he might, and finally to breathe his last into the mist of an unknown eternity, the language of Ingersoll, declaring prayer to be "a useless waste of time," would possess some slight semblance of logic. But in regard to those who reason and cherish a belief in the divine destiny of man, who hope, when this life is finished, to be eternally united with God in the enjoyment of infinite bliss, provided that here on earth, by obedience and faith, by the practice of virtue and unbounded confidence in God's providence, they prove themselves worthy of so sublime and blissful an existence, the efficacy of prayer appears in quite a different light. Therefore that most noble manifestation of the Christian character of the American people, raising their hearts to Heaven for the recovery of their Chief Magistrate, honors the American nation in eyes of all really civilized people upon the globe.

As an American citizen I united with intense sympathy my prayers to those of all true American hearts, but as a priest of the Holy Catholic Church I could do and did far more. I offered the Holy sacrifice of the Mass to the Almighty for the wounded President. Holy Mass being the divinely ordered sacrifice of the New Law, according to the teaching of the Church, is regarded with greater favor in the eyes of God than all the prayers of angels and men united, since it is the offering of Christ himself to His Heavenly Father for the benefit of mankind. Yes, lifting the consecrated host towards heaven, I remembered our wounded President and recommended him to the mercy of God to spare his life, if, to avert, by so doing, a great misfortune to the whole nation.

Ingersoll's indecent attack upon religion is an outrage which shocks the intelligence, piety and moral sense of all respectable people. It shows, moreover, that he is sadly deficient in good judgement, but this is not surprising, because long since he has practically proved himself to belong to followers of Darwin and to have no more knowledge of his Creator than a Brazilian monkey. Nevertheless, he should have at least enough common-sense to keep his stupid utterances to himself, which, after all, any infidel boy of ten could have made for himself. That he did not do, because, like an assassin, he is urged to destroy the pious impression of religion produced by that national movement of prayer. And this he desired to do in order to satisfy his overweening longing to render himself notorious, a craving which in his regard is scarcely intense than that which fills the heart of the notorious assassin Guiteau. In fact my this last movement he has succeeded better than he may have desired. Americans have now a right to tell him: "Yes, Bob, we know you hate better than ever. Be ashamed." But, Americans, I am afraid that this Tom Paine monkey cannot blush, but only bite, scratch and sneer.

A Prize that Catholics Should Contend For.

A plan has been inaugurated in this city which is likely to develop the opinions of a large number of citizens upon the propriety of the parent or the public school authorities controlling the education of the youth of America, and as a large number of Catholics conscientiously believe that they are not fairly dealt with under the present system of public school education, and that many of them will enter their names as contestants for a prize of one thousand dollars, which it is proposed to award to the best answer pro or con, and not exceeding two hundred words in a composition which substantially runs thus. Whether an educational plan embodying the principles set forth in the following seven propositions is preferable to our public-school system, as now established in this State. The propositions are

I.—Parents are bound by the law of Nature each according to his ability, to properly feed, clothe and educate their own children, and willing parents shall be compelled by appropriate legislation to discharge their duties.

II.—It is a public duty to assist, at public expense, in furnishing the necessary means where with to properly feed, clothe and educate children whose parents are unable to feed, clothe and educate them.

III.—No citizen of this State shall ever be taxed for the feeding, clothing or educating of children—and the young whose parents are able to feed, clothe and educate them.

IV.—All such parents are neither mentally nor morally unfit to have the custody of children entrusted, and it is duty to secure to them the education of their own children, schools wherein they believe that neither the teachers, the associations, nor the kind and quantity of food obtainable will endanger either their health, their fitness or their morals, but will best promote their present and eternal welfare.

V.—Neither the State, nor any municipal or other government, organized under its authority, shall ever force upon the child of any parent, not legally adjudged mentally or morally unfit to discharge the duties of the parental relation, particular teacher, book, or system, of religious or non-religious instruction against the conscientious objections of such parent.

VI.—Tuition, when at public expense, shall embrace a good common English education, and business education, added to such a thorough training in one or more of the mechanic arts, of the manufacturing, domestic or productive industries, as will best prepare youth for the practical business of self-support, but shall not extend to the merely ornamental or more abstruse arts or sciences, except in a limited class of cases to be provided for by law as a reward for exalted merit, when supplied with a high order of talent and a special aptitude for such arts or sciences.

VII.—The whole business of educating and training the young shall, like other professions, be open to private enterprise and free competition: provided that the State shall establish and maintain such necessary educational institutions as private enterprise shall fail to establish and maintain; and every parent or guardian entitled to have his or her child or ward educated at public expense, shall select for such purpose his own school, and the teacher or principal of such school shall be paid pro-rata for teaching such pupil a compensation, the maximum of which shall be fixed by law, which compensation shall be proportionate to the progress made by the pupil during any term or period of tuition in the legally appointed secular branches. Such progress to be ascertained by examiners duly elected or appointed in such manner as may be provided by law; but no religious tuition which may be given in any such school shall be at public expense or subject to the superintendence of such examiners.

Besides the $1,000 prize to be given for the best answer, it is proposed to award thirty-one other prizes—one of $100 and thirty smaller prizes—for the next best deserving awards according to merit.

Messrs. A. L. Mann, D. C. Stone and D. McClure of this city, have been named as the committee having charge of the plan. Hon. Thos. H. Hill, Notary Public, 308 Montgomery street, has been appointed Secretary to enroll names of competitors and to receive answers.

The Committee requests competitors to send their names at an early day. As soon as 1500 names are enrolled the contest will cease, but all enrolled competitors will have until November 1st to prepare and file their answers. Answers must be sealed before filing and so remain, until opened by competent literatur to be chosen by the competitors in the manner pointed out in the programme on file with the Secretary. The Committee suggests that, in view of the importance of the issue involved, it is hoped the ability talent in the country will be brought to bear on this important educational question, even independent of any consideration of the prize money offered. All persons can be enrolled by sending their names and $1 prize fee to the address of said Secretary.

A Telling Retort.

The editor of the St. Louis Christian Advocate tells us that his Protestant friends have frequently asked him the question, "What will become of the Catholic Church?" It is about time they were asking the question. Fifty years from now there will not be a Protestant left to make the inquiry. The storm sweeping down in long fury from the sky may say "what will become of the sea," but after a few hours of unrest the billows compose themselves and the tranquil deep says: "What has become of the wind?" Protestantism is the wind—the Catholic Church is the sea. A man lay in sullen doze digesting his midday meal, when a busy housefly lighted on his nose and tickled him into life. The lion yawned. The fly saw the immense jaws open, and in bewilderment cried out, "What will become of this beast?" The jaws came together again with a sudden crash, and what, think you, became of that fly? Methodism is that fly; the Catholic Church is that lion.—Western Watchman.

Wrinkled Faces

It is a painful sight to see some ladies by their teeth with winkled and prematurely old faces; nevertheless it is quite common. Ladies, to those who observe the tendency of the times to reason in every apparent, twing to flaming advertisements and long certificates, in which are used the names of eminent physicians and chemists, the unexpecting and credulous have been induced to use some of the so called Hygiil beautifiers, all of which are known to be positively injurious, and if used for any length of time will destroy the complexion, so that it will be next to impossible to restore it. Mothers should be very careful to see that their daughters do not use these preparations, but ask for and obtain Sheridan's Harmless Vegetable Face Powder, the only harmless beautifier. For sale by all druggists.

An immense snake, declared by those who have caught glimpses of him to be over 20 feet long, lies his haunt near Waterford, Stanislaus County. He lives in a large hole, such as badgers make, and the people are afraid to dig for him.

W. H. Decker, living two miles north of Lemoore, Tulare County, has a peach tree from which he has picked over seven hundred pounds of peaches this year. The tree is seven years old, and measures two feet one inch at the base. It is a seedling.

Major Joseph Magone, well known to old Oregonians, started out from Canyon City, several days ago, to hunt elk. His animals were found tied to a tree, about twenty-five miles from that town, but long search for the Major has failed to discover any further trace of him. He has long resided in Clackamas County, and has several children.

Jno. Edwards, aged thirty-five, eloped with Mrs. C. A. Foster, aged sixty, from Dixon, theother day, the pair having bought tickets for Omaha. Edwards has a wife and children, and Mrs. Foster a husband. The lady is believed to have taken with her between five and six thousand dollars in coin.

—Walker Bell, who keeps a boarding house at Granite Basin, Plumas County, shot and killed his Chinese cook last week. The cook got angry at Mrs. Bell and came out of the kitchen, and when Bell entered, attacked him with a knife; whereupon Mr. Bell procured a shotgun and killed the Chinaman instantly.

—A French investigator, M. Payrot, has been experimenting on the value of sage brush as a preventive and destroyer of phylloxera, being led thereto by noticing that the sagebrush on the plains are free from insects. He proposes either to bury the sagebrush on the plains or to mix the brush with the manure.

—There is a ranch in Colusa County which has been farmed continuously since 1852, always in same kind of grain, and the Sun says it has grown at least twenty-six good crops in the twenty-nine years. Sometimes it has produced fifty bushels to the acre, and never less than twenty-five. It is safe to put the average at not less than thirty bushels for twenty-six years.

—Some seventy-five Chinamen are engaged in placer mining in Spring Valley, south of Unionville, Nevada. In Summer, when water is scarce, they work with rockers, and frequently carry the dirt several hundred yards to the water. They have been at work along Spring Canyon for years, and have taken out hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of gold dust.

FOREIGN CATHOLIC NEWS.

—"We have great pleasure in noting, says the Liverpool Catholic Times "that the Coadjutor Archbishop of Tuam, during the visitation he has just completed, confirmed four thousand children, and to each and every one administered the total abstinence pledge.

—A priest at Gannat, in France, while carrying the elements of the Blessed Sacrament, through the street to a dying man was insulted by a free-thinker. The former requested his assailant to desist, but he proceed, but the man suddenly attacked the ecclesiastic, and stabbed him several times with a knife. The priest was with some difficulty rescued, but died soon after reaching the hospital.

—Amongst the most recent visitors who have come to lay their offerings at the Pope and manifest their homage to the Church was the King of the Sandwich Islands, who is an ardent and faithful Catholic. It is remarkable that the day before the attempt was made to assassinate President Garfield his Holiness published a long cyclical, deploring the melancholy acts of regicides, which, he stated, were the consequence of the propagation of revolutionary doctrines, and reminding the Catholic world that God was the origin of legitimate rule, and that the ordinances of those powers should be submitted to.

—The Pope's organ, the Civiltà, in a comment on the state of Ireland, remarks that the extension of the Coercion Act has in no manner diminished the pitiless evictions in that country. Fortunately, it adds, the sympathy between the people and the clergy is so great that even the most severe policy on the part of the Government has not been able to entire the peasantry into acts contrary to the laws or constitution of the country. If Ireland has not become the theatre of civil war, it is, as history will show at a near future day, not because there are 50,000 troops scattered between Donegal and Cork, but because of the Christian, pacific, and apostolic words, neither servile nor adulatory, of the glorious episcopacy of Ireland, who will receive their just meed of praise later on.

The first visit of Leo XIII. to the Vatican basilica, for gaining the Jubilee indulgence, took place on June 24th. At about 4 o'clock p. m., the large bronze gates of the church were ordered to be closed, and the Holy Father, accompanied by his Domestic Prelates and his court, descended by the private stairs which leads to the chapel of the Blessed Sacrament into the interior of the Basilica. His Holiness remained long in prayer before the altar of that chapel, and likewise at the Confessional, and at the altar of the chapel dedicated to the Cultrice Virgin. As he passed the bronze statue of St. Peter, the Holy Father stopped, inclined his head, and kissed the Apostle's foot, as does the humblest pilgrim who visits St. Peter's. The Pope had been met upon entering the church by a number of Cardinals of the Chapter, who joined with the members of the Pontifical Court in escorting his Holiness in his visit to the various shrines. This visit will be repeated on consecutive Fridays during several weeks, as the Holy Father is not at liberty to go to the churches, and will consequently pay the six prescribed visits for the Jubilee at St. Peter's only.

THE LAND BILL BEFORE THE LORDS.

WHO MADE THE INFERNAL MACHINES.

Particulars of the Dynamite Plot

Opposition to the Land Bill

LONDON, July 28.—In the House of Commons, yesterday, Lord Churchill said, on the third reading of the Land Bill, he would offer a resolution to the effect that the bill, being the cause of Irish agitation, and encourages repudiation of contracts, as opposed to individual liberty, is calculated to diminish the security of property and prosperity in Ireland, and to endanger her union with Great Britain.

SUPPOSED OVER DYNAMITE.

NEW YORK, July 28.—The shipment of infernal machines to England considerably agitates the representatives of the various steamship lines here over the probability of the shipment of dynamite by their vessels. They say they are exercising all the precautions in their power to avoid similar possible occurrences, and agents in charge of the shipments of goods to English ports are watching packages, especially those shipped by strangers, that might contain dynamite.

O'DONOVAN ROSSA DISCHARGE.

The steamship agents have had a conference, and as a result, Rossa, who was deprived of the subsequency of the Alaska line

PASSAGE OF THE LAND BILL.

LONDON, July 29. Early this morning assembled the bill was finally discussed and passed, 220 to 15, the minority being composed of Conservatives, as follows: Bartlett, Earl of Harrowby, Earl Stanhope, Earl Cairn, Hartland, Henry Hoskins, Colonel Hughes, Duke Marlborough, Earl Malmesbury, Lord Beaut, Schreiber, James A. Campbell, Henry Chaplin, Newton and Whitely. Liberals and Conservatives, and some moderates, including Parnell, abstained from voting.

In the House of Lords, the Land Bill was read the first time.

WHERE THE MACHINES

PROVIDE (Ills.), July 29.—Mr. Paul Mercer, city editor of the Journal, yesterday discovered that the Fenian infernal machine recently discovered in this city was manufactured in this city. A director of the Gatling Gun Company of United Irishmen here, and a supposed Fenian, is also about the matter. There were ten of the machines sent to this place, shipped to New York, where they were loaded with dynamite, and then shipped to London. The manufacturer of the machine in question stated the reporter has been invited by one of the accusted parties to witness an exhibition of the machine, which he declines, fearing the trial to be made within a mile of the city

PARNELL'S AMENDMENT OPPOSED.

LONDON, July 29.—Some indignation is felt by the Conservatives at the Government's opposition to Parnell's amendment to the Land Bill, adding to clause 14 a provise that action for rent pending at the same time as a suit for damages for being paid rent shall be suspended until the latter is determined

DISCLOSURES ABOUT THE MACHINES.

PROVIDE, July 29.—The report that the Fenian infernal machines were made here is denied by Mr. Crowe, who says he never believed. P. W. Crowe, who is said to be implicated in their manufacture, denies that he ever saw the machines said made. He states that they were made at O'Rourke's foundry on South Washington street, and that he knew nothing of the operations. The machinery and dynamite were supplied in New York.

PROGRESS OF THE FENIAN SCARE.

NEW YORK, July 29.—O'Donovan Rossa, being interviewed by the Times reporter, admitted that he had advanced $80 towards the Skirmishing Fund and to build an Irish Torpedo boat, which was a failure. Speaking of the infernal machines he says: "The whole farce was got up by an Irishman who belongs to the Longshoremen. He shipped some infernal machines to England and then pretended to act as an informer to the British Government. He went to Consul-General Archibald and told him that explosives had been sent, and furnished him sufficient proof that the shipment had been made. For this story the Irishman received $1000 and was promised $10,000 more when the English police would have seized the explosives. The material which the Irishman shipped cost about $40, and he got $1,000, which will be used to fight the Brooklyn with. Now that Archibald has found the fraud he has been made the victim of this infernal joke, he is tearing his hair with rage.

A MAKER OF INFERNAL MACHINES.

CHICAGO, July 31. The Tribune's Peoria special says: P. W. Crowe now proclaims his authorship of the infernal machines discovered at Liverpool, and says that more are making in Peoria, and will be made until England grants justice to Ireland.

THE LAND BILL BEFORE THE LORDS.

LONDON, August 1.—There was a large attendance on the House of Lords to-day for the second reading of the Land bill, and all the leaders were present except Granville, who is indisposed. Carlingford (Liberal) moved the second reading of the bill in a long speech.

Lord Salisbury followed and was received with loud cheers by the Conservatives. His speech can be summarized as follows: He agrees to the bill under the circumstances, but will stand by amendments for the insertion of a clear definition for fair rent, for the exemption of estates managed on the English system, and tenancies of over £100 yearly from the operation of the bill, and for the maintenance of the inviolability of contracts. The Marquis of Lansdowne (Liberal) regarded the bill as an attempt to quell agrarian aggression by indiscriminate concession of property rights.

Lord Inchiquin (Conservative) strongly condemned the bill.

The Marquis of Waterford (Conservative) said the bill was an act of confiscation without compensation. The whole history of the bill he said, showed it was really an answer to Land League agitation. Lord Carlingford proposed considerably amend the bill in committee.

Lord Lytton said the bill was a revolutionary measure, and to threaten rebellion and a step onward in a course that must end either in the dissolution of the connection between England and Ireland or in civil war.

The Lord President of the Council having defended the bill, the Earl of Argyll moved an adjournment and the debate adjourned.

PARNELL SUSPENDED.

In the Commons Parnell was "named" for offensive language and for disregarding the authority of the Chair, and filibuster on the suspension for the remainder of the sitting. Parnell here interrupted Gladstone, and said he would not go through the farce of awaiting a vote, as the speaker had interfered with freedom of discussion. He then quitted the House. The motion for his suspension was carried by a vote of 134 to 18. Parnell then "named" the presiding in spite of the Speaker's ruling, in defending the action of Irish political prisoners, and declaring that the conduct of the Commons he was assaulted by a Conservative member.

CAUSE OF PARNELL'S ACTION.

It is stated that Parnell's action last night was due to strong expressions of dissatisfaction at the Speaker's ruling, which he considered that efforts should have been made to induce the Conservatives to allow the Land Bill to pass the House of Commons. He was in a meeting decided to ask the Government to adjourn the House for a week, in order to consult and reinforce the Irish Party. Parnell's action was taken without consulting the committee of Irish Parliamentarians.

In the House of Commons, Lord Lytton, in a speech, declaring the Land Bill was a revolutionary measure, and to threaten rebellion and a step onward in a course that must end either in the dissolution of the connection between England and Ireland or in civil war.

Poetry.

THE FIRST BLESSING.

The young priest stood before me,
I knelt me down at his feet;
Was there mystic power, I wonder,
In the word which I heard him repeat?

His sacred hands he lifted,
And placed them upon my head;
In a lowly, murmured whisper,
The benediction was said.

Did God look down from heaven,
When the holy deed was done?
Did He bless me again, who had blessed me,
Through his new anointed one?

Methinks 'twas so, for my spirit
Seemed lightened of all its woe;
And over my frame, "God bless you,"
Thrilled, trembled and seemed to flow.

"God bless you, my child," he murmured,
And into my soul's deep cell
Sank the words of the priest's first blessing,
Ah! I remember them well.

And there dole in my heart a pleasure,
So sweet, so sadly sweet;
Thus my spirit was blessed, I wonder,
In the words which I heard him repeat!

—OR—

THE TRIALS AND TRIUMPHS OF AN IRISH EMIGRANT.

[WRITTEN FOR THE MONITOR BY JULIA ROLLAND.]

At the time my story commences Peter Murphy was a tall, handsome man, better known in his neighborhood as "Pete the Poacher." When he was a small boy he had a habit of setting snare for game, and one day the game-keeper caught him with a large hare. The game-keeper was an old friend of Peter's father, so he let Peter go that time, but the name "Pete the Poacher" followed him while he lived in that neighborhood. Now, Peter was honest in all things but poaching, and believed that the peasant had as much right to the game as the pampered landlord.

Peter's father was a farmer by occupation and lived in the county of Wexford, Ireland, with his parents and wife and three lovely children. Like many of his race, his soul revolted against the tyranny of the landlords, so he determined to leave his native land and emigrate to a land where he would be free from tyrannical landlords and their ruthless agents. One evening he surprised his wife by saying:

"Kate, I have made up my mind to go to America, to the land of the free and the home of the brave, where there are no game laws or game-keepers."

"Do you really mean it, Peter?" said his wife, exhibiting considerable concern.

"I never was more serious in my life. I cannot stand this tyranny any longer. There is that beautiful stream, abounding in fish, not ten rods from my door, and I dare not catch them. Just think of it, Kitty! The river that flows through the farm I pay rent for I have no privilege to fish in. There is game of all kinds, and I must not even look at it. It is outrageous, and I will not put up with it any longer, but I will go to that land beyond the sea where is work and bread for all, and I will find a home for you, my darling, and for our precious babes."

Two months later we find Peter Murphy on a ship bound for America. He had a hundred pounds left after paying their passage; this, with their best clothes, he put into a large chest; as he did so, he said: "This I will retain until I am ready to buy a home in the New World, a home which I can call my own."

Peter and his family landed in New York before Castle Garden was built, and when the emigrant fell an easy prey to the "man-catcher." Peter never before was outside of the county in which he lived, and had no idea of the hustle and bustle people encounter whilst traveling; he was bewildered by the mass of hack-drivers yelling, "Want a carriage?" "Want a hack?"

In the simplicity and honesty of his soul Peter thought that all men were honest, but he was not long in New York before he learned a bitter lesson. He was duped by a hack-man, an unscrupulous fellow, who was ever ready to pounce upon his prey when an opportunity presented itself. Peter hired this fellow to take him to a hotel.

"Your baggage," said the hackman, "is too heavy to take in my carriage, but I will hire a truck to take it. What have you in those boxes that makes them so heavy?"

"There is nothing," innocently replied Peter, but our clothes, and in this one," pointing to the one that contained the treasure, "are our best clothes and a little money."

The hack-driver hailed a rough-looking, red-haired man who was pushing a handcart before him, and said:

"How much will you charge for taking those chests to a hotel?"

"Fifty cents," was the gruff reply.

"Well," here is the number. Take this chest, I can put the other one on the carriage."

The red-haired man pushed his cart away with Peter's chest and money. The hack-driver and the red-haired man pretended to be strangers, but this was not the first chest they had spirited away from poor emigrants and left them destitute.

"Well," said the hack-man to Peter, after the man with the hand-cart was out of sight, "I shall have to hire that man to take this chest too, because I am afraid to put it on my carriage, it is so heavy; you stay here till I come back."

Poor, unsuspecting Peter remained while the hack driver drove away, not to return, but to share the contents of Peter's chest with the red-haired man. He sat there till it was almost dark, and the dock, where a short time ago all was bustle and confusion, became deserted. At last a policeman came up and asked him what he was waiting for.

"I am waiting for the hack-man to come and take us to a hotel," replied Peter, "he has taken one chest there already."

"Have you his number?" said the policeman.

"No sir."

"I am afraid you will have to wait a long time for him. Was your chest valuable?"

"Well, it contained a hundred pounds and our best clothes."

"Did you tell him you had money in it?"

"He asked me what I had in it, and I told him that one contained clothes and a little money."

"I am sorry for you, for I am afraid you will never see your chest again. I think he must be a man-catcher."

"A what! A man-eater! Well, then, she man who was with him looked terrible enough to eat anybody."

"I did not say a man-eater, I said a man-catcher. There are lots of those thieving fellows in this city who make it their business to watch emigrants, and I think they have taken you in pretty good."

Peter dropped his head upon his hands and was lost in deep thought. What would he do if what the policeman told him were true. In a strange land with no money and no friends. America, as he pictured it to himself a few months ago, did not seem so bright to him now.

He thought of his own green isle and wished himself back again by his own pleasant fireside.

"Have you any money left?" continued the policeman.

"I have but a few shillings," replied Peter.

"Well, the best thing you can do is to go to a lodging-house to-night, and to-morrow I will see what I can do for you." So saying, he called an expressman and told him to take Peter and his family to a lodging-house.

The next morning the policeman found Peter and asked him if he could describe the man who took his chest.

"I would know the man with the hand-cart," replied Peter, "any place I would see him, but I do not remember how the other one looked."

Murphy, with the assistance of the policeman, searched all day for his missing chest, but could not find any trace of it.

"You had better give up the search," said the policeman, "for you cannot find it."

The kind-hearted policeman, taking compassion upon the poor stranger, found work for Peter, and paid a month's rent in advance for a room in a tenement house.

When the hot, sultry days of August came they told on poor Kate Murphy very much. The blood faded from her cheek, she was not used to the close tenement house. Oh, how she longed for a breath of the pure, fresh air of her own dear Erin! Alas, this was never to be, for never again was she to visit the land of her birth, where her kindred were sleeping quietly beneath the green grass of Erin. Peter was grieved to see his dear wife grow so pale and wan and the healthy color leave her cheeks.

"Cheer up, dear wife," he said to her, "and as soon as I have money enough I shall leave this close city and go into the country where we can breathe pure air."

He worked heavily all summer, and when October rolled round he found he had money enough to pay their way to Rochester.

It was a cold, bleak, dreary day when Peter and his family alighted at Rochester, with just five dollars left after paying their fare. Here they were again, without money or friends, in a strange city. He took his wife and children to a restaurant, and after partaking of a hearty meal he told his wife to remain there and he would go out to see what kind of a place Rochester was. He strolled along from one street to another, but he took the precaution to take down the street and the number of the house where his wife was, for the short time that he was in New York had made him wonderous wise. He wandered leisurely along until he found himself away out of the city; and he was in the act of retracing his steps when something lying at the roadside arrested his attention. He picked it up, and behold! it was a wallet filled with money! Where would he find the owner? was the thought uppermost in Peter's mind.

He thought of himself the day he landed in New York, how he and his little family were left destitute. "I must try to find the owner," said he aloud.

He hastened back to his Kate and showed her what he had found; he spoke in a whisper for he mistrusted all strangers.

"What shall I do with it?" said Peter to his wife.

"Go find a priest and he will tell you what to do with it, Peter," replied Kate.

"That is just what I will do."

Here was a noble, upright couple, surely; Noble in the sight of God, for never a thought entered their minds to keep one dollar of the money, though they had scarcely a dollar they could call their own.

Peter asked the proprietor of the restaurant where he could find a Catholic priest. That individual, who happened to be a Catholic, directed him to the priest's residence.

Father Molloy, noticing Peter's frieze suit, thought he was not long from the old country, and received him cordially, and after inviting him into little parlor, he said: "Well, my good man, what can I do for you today?"

"Your Reverence, I have found this," said Peter, reaching the pocket-book to the priest, "and came for your advice as to how I will find the owner."

Father Molloy took the pocket-book and examined it, and found it contained a large sum of money, and also found the name, "John Willmer," on the pocket-book. "Where did you find this?"

"I was looking for the employment office, and, instead of finding it, I found that," Peter replied.

"What is your name?"

"Peter Murphy, your reverence."

"How long have you been in Rochester?"

"I arrived to-day from New York. I left home only last Spring with the intention of finding a home in America which I could call my own, and I was robbed as soon as I landed in New York... I worked in the city until this fall, when, fearing for my wife's health, I came to the country. I have only a little money left, and I must find employment soon."

"Well, Mr. Murphy, it is quite fortunate for you that you came to me with this money, for I can tell you where you can find the owner, and I think he will give you employment; he is a rich farmer, who lives a few miles out of town, and employs several men the year round. Although he is a Protestant, we are on quite intimate terms."

The priest then told his servant to get the buggy ready; and he and Peter were soon on their way to Mr. Willmer's. They had gone but a short distance when they met that gentleman coming toward them in great haste.

"You seem to be in a hurry, Mr. Willmer," said the priest.

"I am, indeed, and you must excuse me; I cannot wait a minute," he replied.

"Is your hurry of such a nature that you would not care to tell a friend?"

"The fact of it is, I have lost a large sum of money, an occurrence which never happened before."

"Well, Mr. Willmer, I think I can enlighten you as to where you may find your money. Friend Willmer, allow me to make you acquainted with Mr. Murphy." He then told him how Peter had found the money; how he had come to him with it, and all the circumstances as Peter had related them, and concluded by saying: "You see, Mr. Willmer, he is a genuine Christian. Here he is in a strange land, without money or friends, and three small children and a young wife depending upon him for support, and his first thoughts upon finding this money was to restore it to its owner!"

"He is, indeed," said Mr. Willmer, "not only a true Christian, but an honest, noble man. What can I do for you, Mr. Murphy?"

"Nothing, sir, thank you, I have only done what was just, but I would not object to employment, if you could give it to me."

"Work you shall have. I will hire you by the year and give you a house to live in, and I will also give you a cow. You may bring your family to my place to-day."

"Thank you, Mr. Willmer, but I have nothing to keep horse with."

"Never mind; I will see to that."

"You see, Peter," said the priest, shaking hands with him, "you see God directed you right this morning. I hope you will come to see me soon."

Mr. Willmer went directly into town and got Peter's family. When Peter told his wife how it all turned out, she fervently thanked God that the Evil One did not tempt her husband to keep the money.

As soon as they reached Mr. Willmer's house he told Peter and his wife to remain in the carriage, and he would take the baby into his house and have a joke with his wife. He took the youngest child, a pretty baby boy, and carried it into the kitchen, where his wife was assisting the servant, saying: "See, Mollie, what I have."

Mrs. Willmer was a kind-hearted woman, and having no children of her own, her heart warmed for the pretty little babe, and she exclaimed:

"Oh! John, where did you get it?"

"Glory be to St. Patrick, but where did you get the angel, Mr. Willmer?" exclaimed Ellen Leary, the servant girl.

"I have two more such angels, Ellen," said Mr. Willmer, and he related Peter's story, and how he had brought him home with him.

Mrs. Willmer took the baby from her husband's arms while he went out to bring in the rest. If Mrs. Willmer was surprised at the beauty of the baby, she was equally surprised when she saw the other two children.

"You may stay here, Mr. Murphy, until I fix up the house you are to live in," said Mr. Willmer.

We will now leave Peter for awhile and take a look at the surroundings of Mr. Willmer's residence.

Mr. Willmer's dwelling was a large two-story frame house, built more for comfort than for elegance. In front was a well-kept lawn, to the north were the barns, a' 'ilar, and granaries, fenced in by themselves, and about half a mile from here was the house in which Peter was to live. It was a two-story stone building, hid entirely from view by large forest trees. From the outside it was a gloomy-looking place, as it had been neglected for a number of years. The inside might be called "Spider Hall," for the spiders had taken possession of it, and the doors creaked on their hinges.

"You see, Peter," said Mr. Willmer, as he was showing the house to Peter, "this will be a good house to live in after the spiders and cobwebs are got rid of."

"Why is a fine house like this without anyone living in it?" Peter inquired.

"Well, this house has a history. Years ago, when I was a small boy, a stranger came here and bought fifty acres of land from my father and built this house upon it. I remember well how he looked—he was a tall, fine-looking man, with a noble countenance. Nobody knew anything about him or where he came from. He lived here for some time, and every morning he could be seen walking about his grounds; but after a while the neighbors missed him. My father sent one of the men over to see if he was sick, but instead of finding him sick he found him dead; then none of the neighbors and my father searched the house to find some papers or something to identify him, but that search was fruitless; so they buried him, and to this day it is a mystery to this neighborhood who he was. He must have had considerable money, for this house cost quite a fortune. Some superstitious persons have given the house the name of being haunted, and nobody has lived in it since. It was sold for taxes, and my father bought it, and when he died it passed into my possession. It is of no use to me, so you may live in it as long as you choose. You may go to work and cut down those weeds on the outside, and then you may clean the inside; you will draw your pay all the time."

A week from that day Peter's family found themselves comfortably settled in their new home, and earnestly did they thank God for His kind care, and asked His blessing for their kind benefactor.

"Glory be to God!" said Peter fervently, "we have as good a house to live in as any landlord in Ireland."

For three years Peter and his family lived in the stone house, and nothing came to disturb their happiness. For those three years he worked as a farm hand for Mr. Willmer, who found him faithful and industrious, and each year made him more of a favorite. For those three years Peter's family did not use the upper part of the house, as they had plenty of room down stairs. One day the oldest daughter, Mary, asked her mother if she might have the upper front room for a play-room; her mother said she might, if she cleaned it up. The wall dividing the room from the next was made into panels, and as Mary took her broom to kill a large black spider which was on one of them, the panel gave way and left a great space in the wall almost filled with books and papers. Mary called her mother to see what she had found.

Mrs. Murphy was surprised at what she saw and sent for Mr. Willmer, who came with Peter, and was as much surprised as any of them.

"This is why we never found out anything about the mysterious stranger," he said. "Then he examined some of the papers and exclaimed:

"Why, Peter, this man was an Irishman!"

"Indeed! and Peter, becoming interested."

Mr. Willmer read aloud the following from a paper in his hand:

"I am dying alone in a foreign land far from my kindred. They called me a rebel, because I raised my voice in behalf of my oppressed countrymen. Oh, if I could only live to see dear old Ireland free, then I would be content to die."

They found several letters which we cannot give in this short sketch, and they found plenty of proof to show that the deceased was an Irish patriot, and also that he was Mrs. Murphy's own father. He had hid for some time in the mountains of Wicklow, for there was a price upon his head; he fled in disguise to America when Mrs. Murphy was only six months old, and he bought this place intending to bring his wife and child to America, but his wife died a few months after he left Ireland and he survived her only a short time, and an aunt of Mrs. Murphy cared for her, and she never knew the fate of her father until they found the hidden papers. Mrs. Murphy cried bitterly as she read letter after letter, and said she was glad the thief had stolen their money, for if he had not she might never have heard of her father.

"This property is yours by right, Mrs. Murphy, and you should thank God," said Mr. Willmer, as he unearthed a large sum of money which was secreted with the books and papers.

A few years later Peter bought another place adjoining, and now he has a home he can call his own. He is the same honest, industrious Peter that he always was. Yearly, year he improves his farm, and he is fast becoming a rich man; but this is not all the good he has done, for his good example was the means of converting Mr. and Mrs. Willmer, and he had the joy of seeing them received into the church. They wanted to adopt the little fellow that Ellen Leary called "an angel," but as much as Peter liked them he would not give them his boy. When the youth was old enough, Mr. Willmer sent him to college and paid all his expenses.

Mr. Willmer is now long since numbered with the dead, but before he died he left a legacy of one hundred acres of land and five thousand dollars in money to erect a Catholic church, and the little Francis Murphy is now Pastor of that church, beloved and respected by all who know him, and if he is not an Angel, we trust he is in a fair way to become a saint.

Peter Murphy's hair is now silvered with age, but he still lives in the old stone house. It is with pride and thanks to the Almighty that he looks around him at his vast acres of wheat and corn, where once he saw nothing but a dense forest of beech and maple; but nothing pleases him more than the large congregation that attend the church where his son officiates, and his blue eyes beam with pleasure as he listens to the eloquent preacher. He is never tired of telling that when he first settled in that neighborhood there was not another Catholic besides his own family except Ellen Leary.

"I know," said Ellen Leary, "that his reverence was an Angel the moment I first saw him, when Mr. Willmer brought him into the house a weeny bit of a boy, and it was a lucky day for this neighborhood when Mr. Murphy and his family settled there."

Indeed it was "a lucky day," for he brought wonders by his good example, and he was ever the friend of his countrymen who chanced to pass his door. Every farmer, for miles around, had somebody to work for them that Mr. Murphy had recommended."

My story is ended, and I leave my readers to apply the moral themselves, merely suggesting that it would be well for every reader of the MONITOR to follow Peter Murphy's principle of "Honesty is the best policy," and thus entail upon themselves and their children—what I hope they will all enjoy—the blessing of God.

A CHRISTIAN FATHER.

What M. Dupont Said at the Death and Burial of his Daughter.

Everybody has heard of M. Leon Papin Dupont, the pious man of Tours. He was an incident of his life. After the loss of his wife, his affection centred in his daughter, Henrietta, whose great and precocious intelligence, beauty, grace, and elevation of mind, attracted many admirers. The Christian father fearing the temptations of the world for his child—"My God," he would say, "Thou foreseest that she will stray from the right path, take her from me, rather than she should be led away by vanity." It seemed as if God heard this heroic prayer, poured forth with the faith of Abraham. The girl was struck as if by lightning with typhus fever, and died after five days illness. M. Dupont prepared his child for death, speaking to her of heaven with enthusiasm. I will quote the words of the priest who gave her the last sacraments. "The young girl received the holy Viaticum and Extreme Unction with full consciousness. The doctor was present, a M. Dupont's friend, nor did he abandon him in this sorrowful crisis. The ceremony over, the father, who was kneeling by his child's death-bed, arose, and taking her hand, said: 'Now, daughter, that you have received so many graces, are you happy?' 'Yes, father.' 'Do you regret anything on earth?' 'Yes, father.' 'What then?' 'Leaving you!' 'No, my child, you shall not leave me, we will be separated. God is everywhere, you shall be with Him in heaven, and see Him, I shall pray to Him here, and through Him, I shall be with you.' The child looked at her father intently. 'Yours shall soon fall, mine also one day shall fall; we shall then be united, and for ever more.' Every one of us present was in tears. When the girl breathed her last, her father said to the doctor: 'Doctor, my child is gone God.' He then recited the Magnificat to the astonishment of several who did not understand these sentiments of a true Christian, happy in offering to his God the only child, which was the purity of her soul and beauty of her youth.

At one moment his courage was on the point of breaking down, on the occasion of her funeral. "Do you know, he was a bitter witness; "his daughter laid out on her death-bed. He never left her, and approaching nearer still, his arms crossed, he fixed his eyes on the beloved features, unshaken by death. Tears ran down his cheeks, sobs were choking his utterances. he was just falling to the ground; but, on a sudden, the Christian drew himself on his knees, recollected his scattered thoughts and prayed. Then rising, his face transfigured, a ray of hope shining through his tears: 'I was going to be conquered; and yet my child is nearer to me than she was! Two walls the main door separated us and prevented our re-union; here is crushed, ruined, shall fall, and we shall be forever united!' To visitors offering their condolence he would show the funeral crosses, saying: 'Do not pity me, I am no longer here, why seek you the living with the dead?' He found consolation in the sacred texts he spoke to the Christian of hope and immortality. 'The Lord gave her to me, the Lord hath taken her away, blessed be the name of the Lord. He had inspired him with graceful thoughts: 'As a gardener puts in the hot-house his pots, one flower on the approach of winter, so our Blessed Lord has taken Henrietta, when she was to enter the world, and has passed to the poisonous influence of its manners.

"In the day of his daughter's funeral he distributed alms to the different religious communities of the town. A portion of his money also he gave to the Little Sisters of the Poor.

Crime in Ireland.

If we are to believe the bull-dozed dispatches sent from England, the state of Ireland is one of rapine, murder and arson, but here is an incident that tells the truth about the country Longford, and which doubtless could be extended to nearly every county in Ireland.

A most extraordinary incident took place at the Longford Assizes. Chief Justice Morris, a high prerogative Judge and no favorer of popular agitations, having before him a sample information contained in the calendar disclosing all detected crimes and the report of the police disclosing all undetected crimes, declared that there were only three cases for trial, an extraordinary testimony to the peaceful state of the country. The Chief Justice added that on inquiry from the officials of the county, and from all sources of information, he found that really nothing could be more satisfactory than the state of the county, that the county was in a more satisfactory state than any other in Ireland, that the number of offences had diminished in a singular degree, and that the condition of Longford could not be better.

A Bishop Nearly Run Over by a Train.

HIGHGATE, July 11.—On Friday afternoon, as the Grand Trunk express train going East was leaving the station here, Bishop Cleary, of Kingston, attempted to get on whilst the train was in motion. He managed to catch the hand rail, but missed his footstep, and was dragged a considerable distance in this manner, his feet touching the ground, and his robe entangled around the wheels. He was saved by some persons who were standing on the platform, and helped from his perilous position unhurt.

Monsignorine De Segur.

The following notice of this saintly man, whose death is mourned by the whole Catholic world, we abridge from the Univers of Paris.

France has lost a great apostle. Mgr. de Segur, domestic prelate of his Holiness, and canon of St. Denis, died on Thursday, June 9th, after some days of suffering borne with unalterable patience.

Mgr. de Segur entered the diplomatic career early in life. Being attached to the Roman embassy, the beauties of the Eternal City and the study of the monuments of Christian Rome touched his heart, and whilst exulting his faith, also filled him with love for the Church. To serve it more effectually, he resolved to become a priest, and, abandoning a career which held out to him the prospects of a brilliant future, he entered the seminary of St. Sulpice. From the very first day of this entry he was a model of piety to his fellow-students. This spirit of piety is displayed in the paintings with which he adorned the halls of St. Sulpice and his private oratory. Whatever may be said of their artistic value, the pious inspiration of him who conceived and executed them cannot be doubted, and they tell the spectator that he could have had but one motive to make God loved.

After spending some time in ministering to the prisoners in Paris, Mgr. de Segur returned to the Eternal City as Auditor of the Rota, being induced to accept this position chiefly by his affection for Rome. In his new post he spread around him that charm which was, if we may so speak, the expression of his character. Affectionate and frank, amiable to all, but tolerating no attack on the Church, kind and charitable to the poor, giving abundant alms, and devoting himself in person to numbers of charitable works—such was his daily life. At the Vatican, the young Auditor of the Rota was the object of marked kindness.

By his superior abilities and eminent virtues, Mgr. de Segur seemed to be well fitted for the episcopal office, and his nomination was already made, when God, who destined him for another species of apostolate, sent him a severe trial. He lost the use of one of his eyes. On returning to France for rest and treatment, he retired to a castle in Normandy, where he soon became totally blind. This terrible affliction seemed to be to him rather a source of joy than of sadness. "I am now rescued," he said, smiling, "from wasting my time."

From this moment he devoted his whole life to prayer, writing, preaching, and hearing confessions. He became the apostle of France by his writings, by the preaching of retreats, and by his labors in the confessional.

The enumeration of his writings would make a long list. There hardly a question of high interest arose, but Monsignor de Segur addressed himself to it, hardly an objection, that Mgr. de Segur has not met, with a choice of arguments and a happiness of expression which go directly to the point at issue and to the heart. Mgr. de Segur was admitted to the promenade which Pius IX. made daily in the gardens of the Vatican. Cardinals Bilio, Bonaparte, and Franchi accompanied his Holiness, and conversed with the Monsignor de Segur and his works. The latter showed his satisfaction at the appeal of the Holy Father, but was confused at his expression of praise. "Mgr. de Segur," said the Pontiff, "you are a saint." And this good extends to all parts of the world, for his books are, as it were, cast to the four winds of heaven. Yes, yes, the whole world knows and loves Mgr. de Segur.

Mgr. de Segur knew and felt for the dangers to which youth are exposed in Paris. He became their Mentor, and proved an indefatigable and successful guardian to them. Who can tell the number that he saved? How many has he recalled from the paths of error! How many vocations has he strengthened and secured?

Those who have once seen him offering up the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass can never forget the touching spectacle. His sightless eyes raised to Heaven, faith was painted so visibly on his countenance that we involuntarily exclaimed: "Oh, if he might would have given more life to that countenance.

He was to be a constant labore undermined his constitution. When in his last malady it was proposed to him to receive Extreme Unction, he rejoiced at the news of his speedy release from exile, and he received that last Sacrament with admirable faith and fervor. He answered all the prayers himself, and when they were ended, he was heard to say repeatedly: "Oh, how good it is! How good it is!" One of the priests, his secretary, said to him: "Monsignor, take us all to heaven with you." His countenance lighted up at these words, the smile that was habitual to him played around his lips, and, after some reflection, he said: "Heaven, oh! yes, there is but that! During the course of his malady the word most frequently on his lips was that Christian exclamation of joy. Alleluia!

During the last three days of his life there was a constant stream of visitors of all ranks and ages, who came to receive his blessing and to bid him a last adieu. He smiled on them, blessed them, addressed to each, as long as he was able to speak some words of advice, of farewell, or occasionally of quiet humor. He continued gentle and smiling to the last. And thus at the age of sixty-one he slept in the peace of the Lord.—Am. Morn.

HOW IRELAND WAS CONFISCATED.

CATHOLICS PROSCRIBED IN THEIR OWN COUNTRY.

English Aliens Invited to Ireland—A Chapter of Irish History

"How did the London companies become possessed of land in Ireland?" It arose in this way. In the reign of Elizabeth there was a fierce rebellion in Ulster, headed by the great chiefs O'Neill and O'Donnell, against English rule, which insurrection, after a sanguinary struggle, was subdued, and six counties—Donegal, Fermanagh, Derry, Tyrone, Cavan and Armagh—were escheated to the Crown, according to Froude, about two million acres, were thus confiscated for the part their owners had taken in the insurrection; but a million and a half of acres of bog, forest, and mountain were ultimately restores to the Irish, while half a million acres of fertile land were settled with families of

SOUTH AND ENGLISH PROTESTANTS.

It was in the beginning of the reign of James I. that this colonization of Ulster by Protestant settlers was commenced, and it was his idea to enlist the wealthy and powerful London guilds or livery companies in the scheme, the fundamental principles of which were the exclusion of the ancient inhabitants and the proscription of the Catholic religion. James, therefore, applied to the city of London, and offered to grant to them about a great part of the forfeited estates as an inducement for their undertaking the proposed settlement. The city fathers accordingly undertook the plantation, and, it is said, by some means or other outwitted or overreached the representatives of the Crown in the negotiations, and acquired a much greater extent of land than was contemplated or intended. About two-thirds of the county of Derry was among the twelve chief companies, viz: Mercers, Grocers, Drapers, Fishmongers, Goldsmiths, Skinners, Clothmakers, Merchant Tailors, Salters; Haberdashers, Ironmongers, and Vintners. In the same year, 1613, King James granted a charter to the Londoners for carrying out the scheme, and it was by this document that what is now known as the Irish Society was incorporated, consisting of representatives from the various great companies, who hold certain landed estates and fisheries which could not well be divided, the sites of this town and Coleraine. Charles I., however, revoked the charter, but Charles II. in 1662 granted a fresh charter confirming the previous one, and incorporating the society in its former position, and

FORCIBLY WRESTED OUT BY LOT

THIS LATTER CHARTER IS STILL IN OPERATION.

There were, of course, numerous and special conditions attached to the grants of these large tracts of land to the colonists. The London companies were to expend £20,000 on their plantations in Derry, (referred to at the time as "the late reinated city of Derry," it having been burnt by Sir Cahir O'Doherty, of Inishowen) and Coleraine. The various guilds contributed the necessary outlay, amounting in the whole to £40,000. Derry was rebuilt and walled round, and its name changed to Londonderry, and the colonists spent days on the walls bear the names of the companies who furnished them. Merchant Tailors, Grocers, etc. Coleraine also was built, and Sir John Davis, writing in 1610, speaking of a visit he had paid to "Coleraine" in that year, compared the scene presented by the workmen and materials to "Dido's colony erecting of Carthage in Virgil." Among the other conditions of these grants were, that each holder of two thousand acres was within four years bound to build a castle and inclose a

STRONG BAWN OR COURTYARD,

and holder of one thousand acres was to build a house and bawn within two years, and the holder of less than one thousand acres to enclose a bawn for security against the incursions of rebellion. The first-class holders were also within three years to plant forty-eight men of English or Scotch birth, and so in proportion with the lesser holders. But it was found difficult to enforce the above conditions. Buildings were slowly erected, and it was not easy to obtain British tenants in sufficient numbers; and the Irish being near, and offering higher rents, were received into the districts from which they were to have been excluded; and in this particular the agents of the London companies, who were inter—ted and negligent, were especially

NOTORIOUS FOR THEIR DELINQUENCIES.

One would naturally suppose that the London companies, wealthy as they are and have been from before the time of the colonization of Ulster, having thus acquired large estates on comparatively easy terms, would have done everything possible, out of and wealth, but, so far from that being the case, within about thirty years ago they simply leased their estates to middlemen, whose policy it was to get as much as possible out of their bargains. The result was that these middlemen, some of whom paid down a large a capital sum as £20,000, were unable to let leases extending beyond their own terms, and consequently the Scotch and English settlers could not be expected to develop the enterprise or sink the capital they otherwise would have done had they had the security of really long terms, or better still, perpetuities, and this will to a great extent account for the fact that the county Derry is so much behind Down, Antrim and Armagh

IN MANUFACTURES, TRADE AND COMMERCE.

With Derry and Coleraine in the hands of the Irish Society, and Magherafelt and other small towns in those of others of the companies, no wonder that in times past enterprise has declined to build mills and works to any great extent, in the absence of a clear prospect of a full return for the first outlay. The same cry is still to be the fore in Derry, where the people say that the rule of the Irish Society has a tendency to cripple the trade of the place, and at one instance it is a matter of notoriety, as the writer has written on the heard of it in half a dozen different quarters, that a shipbuilding firm not long ago, wishing to establish a yard on the Foyle, were offered a term of thirty-one years only. They, of course, declined to sink so large a sum as the capital requisite for the purpose on so short a lease, for it would take that time to get the business established. The feeling of Derry people is best expressed by the intended action of Mr. Lewis in the House, viz., an amendment on the Land Bill that the Irish Society shall be bought out or terminated, and the proceeds of the sale of their possessions invested for the benefit of the inhabitants of the city of Derry, the town of Coleraine and the county of Derry.

Fatal Storm in Ireland.

From the Freeman's Journal of the 6th ult. we learn the following particulars:

There burst over Dublin yesterday an arsenal of thunderclouds, spreading its park of heavenly artillery over the whole expanse of sky. The celestial review was unfortunately accompanied by terrestrial fatality. The discharge—peal after peal—was preceded by a period of dull heat, the ominous harbinger of which boded what came.' A gusty but hot wind blew at intervals, like Arabic simoom or Sicilian sirocco. At three the storm broke—a flash of vivid lightning, followed by a deafening thunderclap, opened the sluices of heaven. And then the big rain came dancing to the earth. The crowded streets were emptied in a second, and for a considerable period rain and thunder and lightning had the city from end to end to themselves, clearing all before them. In North King street the spire of St. Paul's Protestant church was struck, and the whole building shaken to its base. Looking at the spire from the street one can see several cracks in the masonry and chips knocked out of the cut stone about six or ten feet from the top of the spire. Lower down are some other cracks and marks where the electric fluid struck the stonework. The spire seems to be one of giant strength, as it is a hard cut stone. In Sackville street a horse bolted, but as the rain had just then cleared the streets, no one was hurt. A valuable horse, the property of a Mr. Kelly, whose yard is near the Royal Barracks, galloped out of its stable and cut its side severely on charging through the yard gate. A poor woman of sixty years of age was struck dead at Crumlin. It appears that three women, all very old—Catherine Connolly, a widow, 19 Cork street; Alice Hanratty, Dolphin's barn, and Eliza Egan, Dolphin's barn, were engaged in weeding a field belonging to Mr. Perry, at Windmill lane, when the storm commenced. They went for shelter under a large tree in the field, and as they were speaking there came a vivid flash of lightning, and all three were thrown with great violence to the ground. When Eagan and Hanratty got up they discovered that Catherine Connolly was dead.

THE MONITOR.

TRUTH TO THE END TO PUBLICATION

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

THURSDAY ..... AUGUST 4.

PASTORAL.

FROM

ARCHBISHOP ALEMANY.

The following Pastoral was read in all the churches throughout this Archdiocese on Sunday last

TO THE CLERGY AND LAITY OF THE DIOCESE OF SAN FRANCISCO.

DEARLY BELOVED: It is our sad duty to address you this time on the disheartening calamity which has thrown our nation into universal gloom and painful anxiety. Forty millions of happy citizens were suddenly shocked at the news of the bold and murderous assault on the life of their head, the President of this glorious Republic. It is not for us to dwell on the horror with which the ignominious name of the assassin will be handed down to posterity; but it is incumbent on us to invoke your Christian sentiments in behalf of our Chief Magistrate. For, no matter what may be the political views or religious tenets of individuals, in him we revere the lawful successor of the "Father of his Country," the heir to his chair, the highest civil ruler of the whole commonwealth. And, consequently, we should not only sympathize with him in his condition, but we should also send our supplications to heaven, imploring the Almighty to grant him heavenly consolation and Christian patience in his illness, and also a speedy recovery, if it be His holy will.

We need not remind you how our forefathers always entertained a reverential feeling for those in authority, whether civil or ecclesiastical, and how, from our most tender age, our little Catechism taught us to honor and obey, not only our parents, but also our superiors, such as magistrates and pastors. Neither need we refer you to the various passages in the Holy Scripture, where we are directed to honor all who are in power, and to be subject to them for conscience sake. But we will make especial mention of the admonition given by St. Paul to his pupil St. Timothy, where he said to him and, through him, to us all: "I desire, therefore, first of all, that supplications, prayers, intercessions, thanksgivings be made for all men; for kings, and all who are in high station . . . (1 Tim. 2). This desire of the Apostle has constantly been complied with by our ancestors in the Faith, even from the remotest antiquity; for, according to St. Augustine and St. Justin, it was the practice of the faithful of their times, when gathered around the altar to assist at the holy sacrifice of the Mass, to offer prayer for their rulers, as well as for the people in general and for the faithful departed. In conformity, therefore, with this ancient practice and our Christian training, and especially in order to execute the desire of the Apostle, let us offer our supplications to heaven, imploring our most merciful Father to extend His divine favor to the highest functionary of the nation.

We would also beg to avail ourselves of this opportunity to allude to what so many deep-thinking and well-meaning men have often observed, namely: that in order to consolidate and ensure the permanency of society, it is all-important to respect

Farm and Home.

May Wheat Now.

The current issue of the San Francisco Journal of Commerce contains the following advice to wheat buyers which may be also profitly read by wheat raisers as well as by wheat buyers:

The present is a favorable time to buy wheat—the most favorable in the year. Wheat is always cheaper in the beginning of the harvest year than subsequently; the approach of the harvest, warns speculators every where that the magazines are about to be replenished, and that the poor are about to revel in the enjoyment derived from cheap and abundant food. Then at once the whole product of the year is in the field or in granaries waiting to be sold, and buyers are favored; there is no exception to this state of things this year.

There is more wheat and a greater plenty of it now than there will be at any other time during the year. We do not now speak of California, but of the world. Short crops, more or less, appears about every where to be the order of the day. There is, however, no scarcity now; that will come later in the season, when prices will everywhere advance. Here especially, the market is lower than it will be; not only will the market here participate in the advance of the market abroad, but the high freights now prevailing will drop. There is now on the way, loading, and in the harbor, sufficient tonage to carry 12,000,000 centals, or 600,000 tons of wheat, as there is about 450,000 tons of shipping which will carry this amount of wheat. All this will be here and loading by the middle of November, when there will be probably enough on the way and loading to carry 800,000 tons at least, and there may be a great deal more than that, and according as freights go down prices will go up, even if there was no other cause of advance. It is very safe, therefore, to purchase wheat now and hold it for a future rise, much safer than it is to purchase much other things. Of course, they who will be the first in the market will have the best show, but there will be a chance of purchasing wheat with advantage for quite a while.

The market now is about 15 cents lower than it was a year ago, and as it will infallibly be higher than it has been during the year, prognostication of the future is remarkably easy. Nothing short of the death of the majority of the wheat eaters of the world, or the growth of wheat in midwinter can prevent it. The unsold stock of old—625,000 tons, reported by the Produce Exchange to day, will have no possible effect on it.

Burned to Death.

A WARNING TO HOUSEKEEPERS.

The Santa Barbara Press of Friday last contained the following account of the dreadful death of Miss Antonio Lopez, by the explosion of a coal oil can in that city, on the 21st ult. "The unfortunate girl was alone in the house with a two-year old sister at the time the accident occurred, her mother and sisters being away shopping. She was building a fire preparatory to making some molasses candy for the little one, and not knowing there was any fire in the stove at the time she picked up a gallon kerosene can, which was about half full, and poured a little in the stove. She had just placed the can on the floor back of the stove when the explosion occurred, and Miss Lopez was covered with blazing oil. She screamed, and ran into the yard and threw herself on the ground, and tried in this manner to smother the flames. Failing in this, she got up and ran around the house several times, till she finally fell from exhaustion in front of the house. A Spanish lady, who was washing in the well-house adjoining, hearing her screams, hastened to her. Although enveloped in flames, and suffering the agonies of a thousand deaths, Miss Lopez, with almost superhuman fortitude, directed the woman to hasten into the house, and save the child. Obeying her instructions the woman ran into the kitchen and found the child was uninjured. Hurrying to a neighbor's house where three men were at work, the woman gave the alarm, but by the time they got to her with a blanket it was too late. Her clothes were almost entirely burned off, only a few strips remaining at the waist, and her limbs, abdomen, and back, from her shoe-tops to her shoulders, were shockingly charred and burned. A messenger was at once despatched for Dr. Knox, who rendered the patient all the assistance in his power, but it was evident from the first that she was fatally injured. She lingered through the night, and up to 11.30 o'clock next day, when she seemed to fall into a painless stupor, but as a rule she suffered excruciating agony. Antonio Lopez was a few months over 17 years of age, and has resided all her life in Santa Barbara, and was universally loved and respected by all who knew her. The family thus plunged into deep mourning have the sympathy of the entire community.

Practical Information.

"What is rack-rent, dad?" inquired a young Comstocker who had been reading the news from Ireland.

The patient parent laid down the stocklist, and replied:

"Do you know how much I charge Mr. Boggarty for his rooms up stairs?"

"Yessir; $12 a month."

"Well, now, suppose Mr. Boggartyshould take it into his head to have, at his own expense, new paper put on the wall, the ceiling whitened, and all the furniture mended; the room would look a heap sight prettier, wouldn't it?"

"Yes!" murmured the intelligent boy.

"Well, if the minute Boggarty had got all these improvements made I should go up and look around, and smile and jingle my money in my pocket, and remark: 'This is a pretty good sort of a layout for a single man, Boggarty, and you have altogether too soft a thing. Your rent will be $20 a month hereafter,—what would you think of it?'

"The innocent child giggled and said, "That would be cheek wouldn't it, dad!"

"Not your money on it, my boy," replied the father, beaming kindly on his offspring. "That would be rack-renting Mr. Boggarty, and it he kicked, and claimed that all the improvements had been made by him without costing us a cent, and I should fire him out, that would be eviction. I will now continued the parent warming up, "briefly review the history of Ireland for the past 700 years. When Irish Born—"

Family Fun.

A Man in a Millinery Store.

She had mildly hinted that she didn't care to go to church again until she had her summer bonnet, but at the mention of bonnet he turned around and belched out:

"Bonnet! Nother new bonnet! Why don't you go down and buy out every in fernal bonnet foundry on Woodward-ave. and be done with it?"

"I haven't had but one this spring," she meekly protested.

"One! Why, you've had forty!"

"Only one, my dear, and I can show you the bill."

"Well, that cost forty or fifty dollars."

"Oh, no. The bill is only nineteen dollars."

"Nineteen dollars! Well, that's an outrageous swindle!"

"It is a very plain bonnet," she remark, "and it was only for spring."

"How much will a summer hat cost?" he asked after reading down to the end of a column.

"Well, I'll try to get along with ten or twelve dollars, but you—"

"Ten or twelve demons!" he yelled as he ball raised up. "I tell you it's an outrageous swindle, and no one but an idiot would submit! They tack the price on because they think you don't know bran from broomsticks!"

"Then go down with me and make the purchase."

"Egad! I will, I'll go this very day, and if I don't buy a better bonnet for $4 than you have ever had for $10 I'll eat shingles!"

That afternoon they entered a millinery store in company, and the old gent had the look of a man who was bound to win if it broke a leg.

"My wife wants a bonnet," he began as he got settled down on a stool.

"Very well. About what price?"

"Say from $4 to $6."

"Yes, sir. Here is one for $4. It is for a kitchen girl on Sixteenth st., and I call it an elegant thing for the money."

"I—I guess we don't want one for four dollars," he muttered, as a chill flew up his spine.

"It's very cheap, I assure you, and the colors are very popular with kitchen girls, but here is one for six dollars."

"Ah! that is more like it! Now I call that handsome."

"So it is, sir. That is for a servant girl on Winder-st., and she certainly has good taste. It is the cheapest bonnet I have made for a year."

"Yes—ahem—no doubt!" gasped the old gent as red streaks began to color his neck and chin.

"And what's the price of this one?"

"That! That is sold to a barber's wife for $8, but I could get you up the mate to it if you want—"

"Barber's wife—sheu—eight dollars—and this one?"

"Well, I made the price very low on that one, as it is for a seamstress who always buys of me. I only charged $12 for that."

"Seamstress, eh!"

"Yes. She goes out for seventy five cents per day, and of course she can't afford any better than this."

Old Whetstone was as red as a strawberry by this time, and it was only by a tremendous effort of will that he could repress a "gosh darn it."

"You wouldn't care to look at this $16 bonnet, as it is for a mechanic's wife, wifely remarked the milliner.

"No—ahem—perhaps not," he grunted.

"But this one at $20 might possibly do, she went on. "Although your wife's position in society would only permit her to wear it for second best. Just wait and I'll show you something for $25 which will charm you."

"I won't! I'll be hanged if I wait a minute!" he exclaimed as he rose up. "I don't feel very well, and I've also agreed to meet a man at the City Hall at 3 o'clock. Martha, you go ahead and pick out a bonnet."

"One for—for—for four dollars," she whispered.

"Four be-bangs! Who said anything about four dollars? If you can make one for $20 do you, I'd take it; but if you look better in one for $25, you can have it sent up. What I was scolding about this morning was the shape of your bonnet—not the cost. I still hold that the shapes are outrageous; but you've got to have one all the same."

And when he got out doors and around the corner, he struck the air with his cane and yelled:

"If a man had played that on me, I'd hunt him to his narrow grave!"

Making Things Over.

"Maria," said Mr. Jones upon one of his worrying days, "it seems to me you might be more economical; now, there's my old clothes, why can't you make them over for the children, instead of giving them away!"

"Because they're worn out when you're done with them," answered Mrs. Jones. "It's no use making over things for the children that won't hold together; you couldn't do it yourself, smart as you are."

"Well," grumbled Jones, "I wouldn't have closets full of things miliewing for want of wear, if I was a woman, that's all. A penny saved is a penny earned."

That was in April. One warm day in May Mr. Jones went prancing through the closets looking for something he couldn't find, and turning things generally inside out.

"Maria!" he screamed, "where's my gray alpaca duster?"

"Made it over for Johnny."

"Alpaca! Well, where's the brown linen one I bought last summer?"

"Clothes-bag!" mumbled Mrs. Jones, who seemed to have a difficulty in her speech at that moment. "Just made it into a nice one."

"Where are my lavender pants?" yelled Jones.

"Cut them over for Willie."

"Heaven!" groaned her husband; then, in a voice of thunder, "Where have my blue suspenders gone to?"

"Hung the baby jumper with them."

"Maria!" asked the astonished man in a subdued voice, "would you mind telling me what you have done with my silk hat? you haven't made it over for the baby, have you?"

"Oh! no, dear," answered his wife cheerfully, "I've used that for a hanging basket. It is full of plants and looks lovely."

Mr. Jones never mentions the word economy or suggests making over—he has had enough of it.

TRUSTWORTHY TESTIMONY.

Some Vital Facts Concerning the Welfare of the Community Made Public.

What Californians Say, and How Their Statements are Confirmed.

[Chronicle.]

No fact has been more plainly manifest during the past few years than the prevalence of chronic diseases. The old constitutions of American people. The steady going habits of Europe tend to longer lives, but the influence of European climate is towards apoplectic and other similar diseases. On the other hand, the hurling habits of the American people necessarily tax the nerve centers and other important portions of the body, while severe and sudden changes of the atmosphere add still more to the difficulties to be overcome.

San Francisco, as well as all cities in this and more southern latitudes, is especially subject to these difficulties, and the necessity for the utmost care, particularly at this season of the year, is clearly manifest to every one who stops to reflect. These facts are especially true with reference to the human kidneys and liver, and the alarming increase of Bright's disease and all minor Kidney difficulties has caused this subject to be a theme of almost universal conversation. Knowing these facts, and in order that our readers might be more thoroughly informed upon the subject, a representative of this paper has taken pains to collect some new and important data, which is herewith presented. Having learned of a remarkable illustration of the subject under consideration, a call was made upon Mrs. N. H. Mason at 37 Liberty street, who, upon being questioned, said:

"For a long time my brother had suffered with Albumenia, and she was treated by the best physicians in this city and in Oakland, but they failed to afford her any relief. When some of the lower extremities set in we were in despair, look of a man who was bound to win if it broke a leg.

"My wife wants a bonnet," he began as he got settled down on a stool.

ERIN'S ADVOCATE IN AMERICA.

final goal of their ambition—the restoration of Ireland to her legislative independence. "Citizens of America, you have placed in under many obligations, and as long as a generous impulse remains in the Irish heart, it will beat in gratitude to you. You have given freedom to the dusky African because he trod the sacred soil of American. We, who belong to the same great branch of the human family as yourselves, yea, the kith and kin of many of you, are still in bondage and are now engaged in a deadly struggle with our inveterate foe, for we have resolved to strike off our chains forever. We appeal to you for a helping hand in order that the hour of our deliverance may be hastened. For this act in duty bound we shall never cease to express our gratitude. But we wish it to be distinctly understood, and we proclaim it in the face of Heaven, that under no circumstances, whether we receive aid from without or not, can we lay down our arms until our bonds are burst, until Ireland is free.

I shall conclude this, my address and appeal to you, in the words of one of the exiles of Erin.

"Where Frank and Tuscan spend their sweat,
The costly crop is theirs;
If Norway's toil make rich the soil,
She eats the fruit she rears.
O'er Malta's green sward three rules so laid,
Proclaim the Lord on high,
But we are serfs in our land,
Yes, freeman, should know why."

Redpath's Revelations.

IRELAND REVISITED BY AN AMERICAN JOURNALIST.

Startling Statistics and Sorrowful Scenes Witnessed by James Redpath.

Two Letters that Tell a Sad Story.

From the first and second letters of James Redpath, the well-known popular American journalist, who is at present in Ireland, we cull the following facts which will be eagerly perused by every reader of the MONITOR.

Redpath's First Letter.

DUBLIN, July 8, 1881.

After a pleasant voyage, with pleasant fellow voyagers, in the Steamer Wyoming, I landed in Liverpool more than two weeks since, and after a rapid visit to London and Paris, I arrived here ten days ago.

PARNELL AND THE IRISH PARTY.

In London I interviewed Mr. Parnell and the leaders of the Irish Parliamentary party; and,—when in Paris, I saw Mr. Egan, the Treasurer of the Irish National Land League. The Irish members do not regard the Land Bill as an important concession to the just demands of the people of Ireland. They say that at the best it will benefit a small class only, and that class only of the tenant-farmers who are the least oppressed by the present system, even if it could pass the House of Lords without any vital amendments in the interests of the lords of the soil. But as the Irish people must submit to the Bill, if it becomes a law, whether they wish to accept or reject it, the Irish members are trying, at every stage of the discussion, to eliminate the more objectionable features of it, and to make it more liberal to the tenantry. Mr. Parnell told me that he would probably revisit America after the passage of the Bill or as soon as it had passed its most important stages.

FINANCIAL RESOURCES OF THE LAND LEAGUE.

Mr. Egan informed me that he had over a quarter of a million of dollars in hand, contributed mostly by Irish Americans, and with such a fund in reserve, especially as it is rapidly increasing, the passage of the Land Bill will have no effect on the conduct of the agitation for the abolition of feudal landlordism in Ireland. The movement will not only be continued without a pause, but it will be pushed forward with more energy than before.

MORE ARREST FOR NON-PAYMENT IN JAIL.

Dr. Kenny of Dublin was in London. He had seen Mr. Davitt. He says that Mr. Davitt is treated as well as it is possible to treat a prisoner in a convict jail, but that while his health is still good, his constitution, which was nearly shattered by former convict life, would at once break down if he were to be subjected to the ordinary discipline of the prison. His spirits are as brave as when he was organizing the Land League in Ireland. A movement has been inaugurated in England to procure Mr. Davitt's release if he will agree to leave the country and not return to Ireland.

THE LAND LEAGUE IN IRELAND.

Notice have been great changes in Ireland since my last visit here. There are not so many Land League Meetings held, and I notice that the tone of the speeches, as a rule, has been greatly modified. Not one of the conspicuous leaders of last autumn is in the field to-day. Those who are not in Parliament are in prison. But, on the other hand, the spirit of the people, instead of having been subdued, is not only as resolute as then, but even more defiant. There are eighteen hundred Land Leagues in active operation. Not one has been disorganized. As soon as a local officer is sent to jail, his place is supplied without a day's delay. There are nearly 400 Ladies' Land Leagues in Ireland. There was not one last autumn. A thousand local leagues, at least, have been established since September.

IRISH PRIESTS AND PRELATES.

The priests have joined the movement in large numbers since autumn. Only one high ecclesiastic, the Archbishop of Dublin, has assumed an open attitude of opposition to the League. His authority prevents the priests of his archdiocese from taking any active part in the agitation, but it neither destroys their secret sympathy, nor has it the slightest influence on the people here or elsewhere throughout Ireland. In different parts of Ireland, last autumn, when the action of the Archbishop of Dublin was spoken of, the common answer that I received, both from priests and people, was "Sure there never has been a patriot Archbishop of Dublin since St. Laurence O'Toole." It is a common expression to-day in Dublin, which St. Laurence O'Toole is the patron saint.

The other prelates—and especially the Archbishop of Cashel—who have taken a conspicuous position in favor of the agitation, have greatly strengthened their hold on the affections of the people. Of Mr. Parnell and his Parliamentary associates, on their return from their visits in London, should he arrested and sent to Kilmainham Jail, there seems to be little doubt that the Hierarchy and priesthood would at once step to the front and boldly continue the agitation in defiance of the Irish-curled Cromwell who has sent one member of Parliament and one bishop to prison. The imprisonment of an Archbishop and a Bishop or two would be the death knell of landlordism in Ireland.

EVICTIONS IN IRELAND.

Eviction papers are falling thick and fast in every part of Ireland. With 50,000 soldiers and 12,000 armed constabulary to drive the peasants from their homes, the landlords are having their revenge, but still—unlike the days of 1849—they fall utterly to subdue the spirit of the people. The tenants of England will be known in Irish history as Victoria the Evictor. Sensitive ears always repellant; but I will venture to illustrate by a few figures how thoroughly the work of the ruthless Cromwell has been done during the reign of Her Most Gracious Majesty.

In 1849, there were more than 90,000 persons evicted in Ireland.

In 1850, there were over 104,000 cast from their homes into the roadside.

In 1860, there were nearly 200,000 persons evicted. In 1864, 9,200; in 1880, over 10,000.

DECREASE OF POPULATION.

The population of Ireland, which was nearly nine millions within the memory of man still young, is now only 5,150,000—less to-day than it was eighty years ago! And yet the Irish landlords and the English Government are not satisfied—and yet they still insist on meeting the emigration of Irish by grants of public money.

EVICTIONS THIS YEAR.

During the first three months of the present year, a parliamentary paper just published shows that in the province of Ulster 838 persons have been evicted; in Leinster, 258 persons; in Connaught, 281 persons; and in Munster, 354 persons.

EVICTIONS IN THE SLIGHT AND FAMINE YEARS.

During the three years, ending in April last, 7,590 persons in Ireland were thrown out of the cabins that their own hands had built, and from the lands that their own labor had reclaimed. In Munster alone last year over 4,000 persons were evicted. This expulsion of the people occured during and in consequence of three bad seasons, and these persons, thus evicted, for the most part, during the famine of 1879-80, were kept alive by American and Canadian and Australian charity!

Redpath's Second Letter.

DUBLIN, July 10, 1881

One hundred and eighty persons have been arrested under the Coercion Act. Wherever the local Land Leagues are giving too much sympathy to the Irish landlords, the Secretary and Treasurer are arrested and taken out of Ireland's way. When it is utterly impossible to get a Crown case, the "speech of a reasonable suspicion" that they are inciting to riot, they are arrested under the vague generality of "treasonable practices." Gladstone's government is as friendly to landlordism as the administration of Beaconsfield. Gladstone desires, as Beaconsfield would have fought, to maintain the institution. Gladstone wishes to modify it, while Beaconsfield would have tried to keep it unchanged. The Irish peasantry and farmers are indifferent to the Land Bill. They understand it thoroughly. They know that it will be only

ANOTHER SOP[illegible] AFTER [illegible]

—that no effect will be produced on the existence of a system of feudal landlordism which has kept them in wretchedness for three centuries. The tenants are judging that the Land Question will fail to understand it, and gravely misinterpret it, if they regard it from the point of view of business or of political science only—if they forget that landlord and tenant here, unlike landlord and tenant in America, are not mere contracting parties, equally independent and equally dependent, meeting in a fair and open market; but that here they are hereditary enemies who for ten generations have occupied the relation of master and serf—persecuting State Religionists and martyrs of the Church respectively; that all the power of the Government is still unrelaxed and exercised on the side of the landlord; and that both Government and landlord are regarded by the people as alien and usurpers—not in a sentimental or historical sense, but with that there is no such thing, in fact, but only in theory, as my "contract" between landowner and landtiller, but that the master of the soil holds the tiller at his absolute mercy, because that the diversity of industry in Ireland; and that, even if Mr. Parnell himself should draft a Land Bill that preserved the property of the landlords in it, and the Government should accept it, and it should receive the Royal assent, it would not and could not benefit the peasantry, because the Irish courts are exclusively composed, and as long as the present British Constitution lasts, they must necessarily be composed of landlords; and because the judiciary of Ireland is as the most corrupt and partisan judiciary in Eastern Europe.

A LIVING DEADLY HATRED;

A VISIT TO THE IRISH BASTILE.

I have spent two days in visiting "the Suspects" in Kilmainham Jail. Do Americans know what a Suspect is? It is a man detained in jail without trial, and without accusation, there to remain until September, 1882, when, on his release, he shall have no redress. Some of the most eloquent denunciations of the French Republique—of a century ago—that have been in my memory for years, I heard from the lips of the Suspects. The English Coercion Laws of to-day arm the "Irish Secretary —who is always an Englishman—with precisely the same arbitrary power that the Jacobin leaders possessed from La Loi du Suspect, and with precisely the same power of lettres-de-cachet that enabled the old French noblesse to send innocent men whom they hated to the Bastile.

KILMAINHAM IS THE BASTILE OF IRELAND.

It is an old prison of the gloomiest description. Solid stone walls, inside and inside—a jail within a jail—walls of a thickness not deemed necessary now in building any modern prisons—long, low damp passage ways, and heavy bolts and massive iron doors everywhere—musty smells as you go along the stony corridors and ascend the stony stairways—silent officers in uniform everywhere made of it a place of redness sentiment in the streets and around the building—it is not a residence to be desired, even although the rules that govern it, as applied to the Suspects, are lenient enough, and although the officers are respectful to the visitors and courteous to the patriots whom they guard.

Each suspect is allowed to have one visitor daily. The interview is limited to fifteen minutes.

On my first visit

I SAW DILLON, BOYTON AND BRENNAN.

Along a low, tunnel-like passage, stone above, around, and below you; across a large room; up an old stone stairway worn with the feet of generations of prisoners—we enter a sort of court in which the Suspects are allowed to take exercise, although they are hidden from our view behind a high board fence. Enter a cell. It is divided into three divisions or cuops. At the further side stands the prisoner behind a sort of wire fence, breast high; in the middle cuop between us stands a silent warder, while beside you stands a second warder, your guide. The middle space is narrow enough to enable the visitor to shake hands with his friend, the Suspect.

The prison rules do not permit you to talk about politics. Yet a reasonable range of topics is freely allowed by the silent warders.

The alleged extracts from Mr. Dillon's last speech by which Secretary Forster in Parliament justified his arrest and incarceration without trial—were demonstrably garbled by that honest Quaker, the British Cyclops of the Irish "Backshot Policy." This is shown by the report of it published next day by the Irish Times, a journal unfriendly to the Land League. But the spirit that once said "It is a good enough Morgan until after election," is as potent in the English political circles to-day as in the lowest American ward headquarters.

It is the reductio ad absurdum of British rags about liberty to say that a quiet man as Mr. Dillon, with his pure, mild, and eyes—such a man "reasonably suspected," quotha, of inciting the people to riot!—

THE HAMLET OF IRISH POLITICS,

this refined, poetic, introspective nature, driven out of its rightful sphere because the times are so out of joint that his conscience forces him, latting action, to act! Such a nature in any sane social system would adopt the life of an artistic recluse, seeking to extend the domains of science, of philosophy, adhorring the strife of political agitation and deeping its crude and rude rewards.

In the hospital I saw Mr. Boyton. He has been seriously ill. He has been obliged to submit to a surgical operation. His eyes are weak and inflamed. He looks much older than when I saw him last. He had not heard of Secretary Blaine's letter about him, and he did not know that his own father had failed to complete his naturalization papers. He did not seem to care one thing about it. He is in excellent spirits. He told me to say to his friends in America that he could leave the prison to-morrow if he would agree to abstain from any further part in the agitation. He preferred to remain rather than give any such pledge. He is rapidly recovering his health.

THEY WERE NOT WORTH ANOTHER [illegible]

Mr. Brennan, the former Secretary of the Land League, is in equally good spirits. Mr. Kettle and Mr. Brennan were imprisoned because they urged the farmers not to pay any rents at all until their grievances were redressed. That is a bad policy, it seems, had been fully discussed, a week before in a council of the Irish leaders in London, and it came to the resolution that the time was not yet ripe for such a policy—that is to say, to order a general strike. Mr. Brennan and Mr. Kettle sincerely and urged the policy in Ireland the following Sunday.

THEY WERE IMMEDIATELY ARRESTED.

There is a good deal of feeling, I find, between the two wings of the party—the "Moderate" and the "Advanced"—but there is ever little likelihood that it will result in any serious controversy. Indeed, throughout Ireland, nearly every active leader of the advanced (or as we should say Stalwart) wing of the party is in jail, and therefore there is no opportunity for a contest for supremacy. It may enable Irish leaders to understand the divergency when I add that the moderates are the supporters of the Parliamentary party and the Stalwarts the Kilmainham party.

Mr. Dillon and Mr. Brennan may be regarded as the representative men of the Stalwarts and the latter is a friend of Father Sheehy among the clergy. Father Sheehy is a priest in jail for reasons that I shall state in future letters. He is one of the best men I ever met—and yet he, also, is in the Irish Bastile.

I am personally acquainted with more than twenty of the Suspects. Long before they were in jail I had used to speak of them individually to Irishmen in America as my noblest types of Celtic character. In America they seem to me like men from one who knew them without regard to their race or creed. Such are the men that England imprisons! JAMES REDPATH.

THE OUTRAGE AT THE FUNERAL OF PIUS IX.

A Rome dispatch to the London Universe gives the following additional particulars relating to the attempted desecration of the remains of Pope Pius IX. by the Italian lazaroni

St. Peter's was closed to the public during the ceremonies attendant upon the removal of the body of Pius IX. from its temporary resting-place. The vault was opened in the presence of Monsignori Perfoli, Appolloni, and Machi, the entire Chapter of St. Peter's, and Padre Domenico Mulieroni, rector of the Church of San Lorenzo, who was charged to receive the body. After the opening of the outer case of wood and the verification of the seals on the leaden coffin, among which was that of the present Pope, who was then chamberlain, the body was carried to the chapel, the choir menwhile chanting a Miserere in undertones. The ceremonies within the church lasted until 11.45, at which hour precisely the body was placed on a funeral car and covered with the ecclesiastical crimson draperies, embroidered with gold, which have been used to decorate the Loggia della Benedizione since the time of Innocent III.

At the moment of starting the Piazza was illuminated by the Bengal light, which, with the thousand torches carried by the assistants, produced an extraordinary effect. The procession, surrounded and followed by an immense mass of people, proceeded quietly for some distance, until cries began to arise in the crowd of "Viva l'Italia," "Viva Garibaldi, "joined to by those following the bearer with counter cries of "Viva Pio Nono," "Viva Il Papa Re."

Then a most scandalous and disgraceful scene commenced. The torches were seized and extinguished, sticks were freely used, and the funeral car was urged forward at a trot, surrounded by breathless priests, whose loud chanting was partly drowned by the cries and hootings. Lines of police were formed across the streets, and were twice broken through. Along the immense length of the Via Nazionale the scene was intolerably painful. Of six thousand torches surrounding the bier at St. Peter's only a few hundreds reached the cemetery. Here two companies of soldiers kept the crowd in check; but during the final ceremonies of interment in San Lorenzo the noise of the crowd outside was distinctly audible.

WHEAT—It is pretty well settled now that shippers are filling their requirements in the country at lower figures than last week. Prices are unsettled but strong, and sales can be long made at an advance, although experience of some are endeavoring to keep them down. It was said to-day on good authority that 1,500 cts gilt-edged, in Butte County, was bought at the equivalent of $1 50 here, and it is reported that millers are paying this figure for choice, although no transactions at that price are reported. The only transactions on Change to-day was much better than yesterday, the following sales being reported: 2,000 tons fair to good shipping, $1 40 @$1 45; 60 tons Scotts, $1 50; 11 tons 50 tons shipping, $1 50; 30 tons and 1,800 and 1,700 sks No. 1 do, $1 45; 50 tons do and 650 sks No. 2, $1 42½; 2,500 and 700 sks No. 2, $1 37½, and 1,900 sks coast $1 35. Barley is quiet and $1 dull; 37½c with an advance for choice special lots, and No. 1 at 37½c; and 1 cts, $1 40.

BARLEY—The demand for feed was by no means active, to-day as yesterday, but holders are firm and refused to sell choice at 97½c. Sales of 600 sks special at 97½c; 1,000 sks fair at 95c, and 400 sks poor dark at 92½c, being the only transactions reported. Brewing is quoted at $1 12½ for light, and $1 17½@1 20 for bright and heavy. Standard Brewing nominally at 95c @1 00.

OATS—Under lots find a good demand at full prices, and the market is firmer. Sales to-day of 100 sks Western at $1 65; 100 sks at $1 60; 100 sks do, $1 37½. Good and choice, $1 50@1 60; common, $1 40@1 45; inferior, $1 25@1 35.

Poetry.

IRISH DAISIES

She was a little Irish maid,
With light brown hair and eyes of gray,
And she left her native shores,
And journeyed miles and miles away
Across the ocean, to the land
Where wealth is more than free,
And on her face a shadow lay,
For sick at heart for home was she.

When from the city's dust and heat,
And ceaseless noise, they took her where
The birds were singing in the trees,
And flower fragrance filled the air,
And those their bed prepared beside (praised)
To great the pretty gray eyed lass,
A million blossoms starred the road,
And grew amid the waving grass.

"Why, here are daisies!" glad she cried,
And with hands clasped sank or her knees
"Now, God be praised, will East and West
Scatters such lovely things as these!
Around my mother's cabin door
In dear old Ireland they grow,
With hearts of gold, and shaded leaves
As white as newly fallen snow."

Then up she sprang with smiling lips,
Flushed her pale cheek there lay a tear,
"This land's not half so strange," she said,
Since I have found the daisies here."

Literary Miscellany.

Saved by a Dream.

Several years ago I resided in a wild, mountainous, and rather lonely region.

There was a railroad but a few rode in front of my door, and a station and a village about a mile to the west.

The nearest station to the east was about ten miles distant.

I moved to the place with my young wife late in the autumn, and about the first of the following March I was attacked with typhoid fever, and was sick for about a month.

As soon as I got strong enough to sit up, and walk a little, I told my wife she had better go and visit her brother, who lived about fifty miles to the east of us.

She hesitated about leaving me, fearing I might need her, but after waiting a few days, and seeing that I continued to regain my health and strength, she, one pleasant morning about the middle of April, started, intending to be gone between one and two weeks.

The weather for about a week after my wife left me was dry and pleasant.

On very warm and pleasant days I would venture to take a short walk in the forests near by.

One day I exercised a little beyond my strength, and felt quite tired at night, and lay awake for a long time.

At last I fell into an uneasy slumber, and dreamed a very curious and startling dream.

I seemed to have gone forward into the future a couple of days.

It seemed to me that a heavy rain had been falling the latter of the day, and all of the day before, but the evening was clear and pleasant and not very dark, though the moon was not shining.

I seemed to be walking along the railroad track towards the east.

I first passed through a piece of woods about half a mile wide; then for about a mile through a cleared field containing a couple of farm houses, one inhabited and the other deserted.

I then entered another wood, and, after walking about a mile and a half, I came to a stream greatly swollen by rain, which had washed the railroad bridge so much that the passenger train, in attempting to cross, had broken it down, and the bridge and carriage completely wrecked were lying on both sides of the stream, except portions that were floating down.

Some of the passengers lay dead or dying among the ruins, some were floating in the water, and a few were clinging to the trees and bushes on the shore.

It was a fearful and heartrending sight.

Although I was a stranger, I seemed to see all these things very distinctly, and can well remember my feelings as I surveyed the scene.

While viewing the ladies in the water, I suddenly caught sight of the mangled form of my wife, and with a wild cry I awoke.

This dream made a great impression on my mind.

The next day, early in the morning, it commenced raining, and continued to rain through the day and following night.

I felt very lonely and uneasy all day, which feeling was increased by receiving a letter from my wife, saying that she intended to come home on Friday night on the express train. I retired late, feeling much worried, and had to add to the dream was repeated, and even more distinct and vivid than before.

When I arose in the morning the rain was still falling.

This was Friday, and therefore was the day on which my wife was to start for home.

That, were two passenger trains from the east each day, one at nine o'clock in the forenoon and the other at nine in the evening. This last was the express, and the one on which my wife was coming.

Towards the middle of the afternoon the rain ceased falling, and the clouds slowly cleared away.

The dream had made such an impression on my mind that I resolved to attempt to prevent the dream I had seen so plainly in my dreams, and, if it appeared at all dangerous, to attempt to stop the train before reaching it.

Accordingly soon after the rain was over I got ready and started.

I had never before had occasion to visit the station in this direction, and therefore was entirely unacquainted with this part of the country. But I found everything just as it had appeared in my dream.

In fact, everything seemed so natural as to lead really been this way before.

I walked slowly, and late in the afternoon I came to the stream, which flowed rapidly and seemed much swollen.

But the bridge, instead of being broken down and mingled with the broken carriages and mangled passengers, was still standing, and though its timbers looked quite old and weather-beaten, there seemed to be little danger of its breaking down beneath the weight of a passing train.

There was a heavy freight train due from the west about six o'clock, and I resolved to wait at least until it came, and if it passed over in safety there would be, I thought, but little danger of accident by the lighter passenger train.

In due time it came thundering along, and passed safely over the bridge.

But, though it might have been owing to my excited imagination, it seemed to me that the bridge bent and shook beneath the weight of the train in a manner highly suggestive of danger.

At all events I resolved to wait a while longer, and see if the stream, which was still rising, would have any apparent effect upon the bridge. I took with me a lantern, and also a thick blanket to protect me from the damp night air.

Shortly after sunset, as I was sitting a few rods from this stream, I heard a loud splash, and, hurrying to the bridge, I saw that a portion of the bank on the opposite side had broken away, and also that the action of the water, or some other cause, had weakened the foundations of the bridge in such a manner that a portion of the track was bent and lowered enough to make it impossible for a train to cross.

Immediately crossed the bridge, resolved to stop the train, if possible, before it reached the bridge and certain destruction.

I went on, and soon found a place which commanded a good view of the track for a considerable distance. I lit my lantern, wrapped my blanket closely around me, and sat down to my wearisome vigil of two hours.

Slowly the moments passed by, but at last a few minutes would decide the fate of the train and its human freight.

Soon I saw a light, far away and very small at first, but rapidly growing larger and brighter.

I arose, trembling with excitement, and commenced swinging the lantern above my head; and, as the train drew near, I redoubled my exertions and shouted as loud as I could.

Onward came the train at a rapid speed.

It was a time of terrible suspense to me.

Should the engineer fail to see my signal, or not see it in time to stop the train before going a few rods past me, I knew that no human power could save it.

On it came, and just as I gave up my exertions and stepped from the track my frantic signals were observed, and the whistle was sounded.

The train was quickly stopped, and I then informed the engineer and conductor of the danger ahead, which I did not tell the passengers left the carriages and gathered around me.

Among the passengers I found my wife, not mangled and lifeless, but alive and well, though somewhat frightened and a good deal surprised at seeing me.

The train was backed to the station it had just left, from which telegrams were sent to warn all other trains of the danger.

In the morning my wife and I started for home.

I do not pretend to be able to explain this dream, which was certainly a remarkable one, but I am satisfied that this dream was the means of saving many human lives from a sudden and most terrible death.

THE CROWN OF THORNS

Preserved in the Treasury of the Cathedral of the Archdiocese of Paris.

Its Authenticity Assured by History and by Intrinsic Evidence.

The Church is in possession of the Crown of Thorns that pressed the Redeemer's head in His hour of suffering. It is easy to judge how earnestly the early Church would have strivem to preserve such a precious relic, but it must have been a difficult matter, so hotly did persecution rage in these first days.

Yet we possess, beyond all doubt, the very Crown which Jesus wore in mockery and torture; and in this season it will be interesting to trace its history in the Church, not only out of devotion, but as an important fact of monumental evidence in favor of Him who alone wore a Crown of Thorns.

This relic is especially remarkable by reason of its comparative integrity; it has come down to us in the Church of France, from the days of St. Louis; it is preserved in the treasury of the Cathedral of the Archdiocese of Paris.

Like other relics of the Passion, it remained hidden during the ages of persecution under the pagan emperors. In 409 St. Paulinus, Bishop of Nola, speaks of its existence as a thing well known. St. Gregory, of Tours, seems to have been one of the earliest to speak openly of this relic. About the year 800, the patriarch of Jerusalem sent to Charlemagne one nail, some thorns, and a considerable portion of the Cross. These relics Charles the Bald gave to the Abbey of St. Denis, as we find certified in an inscription on an ancient tomb.

To stimulate the first Crusaders to the taking of Constantinople, the Emperor, Alexis Comnenus, wrote in 1100 to Robert, Count of Flanders, sending a list of relics of the Passion that were preserved in that city. In this list was mentioned the Crown of Thorns.

In 1238, Baldwin II., Emperor of Constantinople had borrowed from the Venetians 134,000 livres, and being unable to pay, he applied to the King of France for aid. The latter assumed the debt, and thus became possessed of the "Crown of Thorns, which had been given in pledge for the money.

Gosselin thus narrates the fact of its coming into France. The movement attracted the attention of all Europe. St. Louis sent to Constantinople two Dominicans, Fathers James and Andrew, one of whom, from a previous residence in this city, knew all about the relic. Baldwin, then at St. Germain, sent with them a high officer of his retinue, bearing letters patent for the delivery of the relic. Every precaution was taken to attest its authenticity and to preserve it from harm or risk. The chest enclosing it was sealed with the seals of the French nobles.

The "Holy Crown" reached Venice in safety, and was deposited in the treasury of St. Mark until the financial transactions with the Venetians were completed. Having again verified the seals, the ambassadors resumed their journey, St. Louis, with the Queen Mother and the royal princes his brothers, accompanied by many prelates and lords of the Court, met the holy relic at Villeneuve, near Sens, on the 10th of August, 1239.

The wooden case or chest was opened—then the silver shrine, and lastly a vase of gold that held the crown, and it was presented to the King and attendants for reverent inspection. Next morning the King set out for Paris, where for eight days took place the solemn reception of the Holy Relic.

Some years later St. Louis built the chapel which we see to-day at a cost of about 800,000 livres of the present money. This edifice was completed in 1248, about the very time when the people of Pisa were consecrating a similar reliquary shaped to another portion of the "Crown of Thorns."

The "Santa Maria della Spina" of Pisa is, like the Holy chapel of Paris, a marvel of architecture; both shrines, marble and stone alike true to the instability of human things, have almost disappeared in renovations, but the holy relics know no change.

Breiver tells us, the city of Paris had obtained other relics of the Passion long before this period. The Emperor Justinian gave St. Germanus, Archbishop of Paris, some thorns of the Holy Crown which were placed in the Church of the Holy Cross. From the "Great Annals of France" we learn that Constantine VI. offered Charlemagne on his return from Jerusalem great presents, gold, silver and precious stones. Charlemagne replied, "I understook this expedition for the honor of the Lord Jesus Christ, I will accept no temporal reward. What I desire is some relics of the passion of Jesus Christ, and of his saints." Thereupon the Emperor gave him one of the nails, some thorns of the crown, and a good portion of the stock of the true cross.

All these relics were preserved in the "Holy Chapel" in rich reliquaries until the revolution. The shrine of "Notre Dame" tells us the history of this great relic, with which St. Louis enriched the oldest daughter of the church.

On the first face we read "The Holy Crown of Jesus Christ, wen by Baldwin at the taking of Constantinople, in 1204, and pledged to the Venitians in 1228, was received with great pity by St. Louis, at Villeneuve, near Sens, August 10th, 1239."

On the second face—"Transferred to the Holy Chapel in the Abbey of St. Denis, in France, by order of Louis XVI., in 1791. Carried back to Paris in 1793; despoiled at the Mint, and brought to the National Library in 1794, it was at length restored to the church of Notre Dame, by order of the Government, October 26, 1801."

On the third face—"Venitiel, October 11, 1802, by the Cardinal Caprara, Legate of Pius, Vicar-General of Christ, commissioned in 1791 to take a particle of it for Port Royal, it has been translated solemnly to the Church of Notre Dame by J. B. Cardinal de Bellay, Archbishop of Paris, August 10th, 1806."

The crown is enclosed in a ring of crystal, fastened by gilded bronze work with cords of red silk.

The crown is composed of small reed-canes tied in bundles. Inner diameter of ring, 210 millimetres, diameter of section, five millimetres; reeds tied by 16 strings of same cause; a gold wire runs in the bend of the bands to hold together all these sacred fragments; diameter of reed, which is very fine, varies from one to one and half millimetre. Some of them are bent, showing that they have been green. Their surface, examined with a glass, is furrowed with minute ribs.

M. Rohault de Fleury, the special antiquary of the Passion relics, makes a very elaborate reflection on this reader. Independent of the authenticity assured by history to the relics of Notre Dame the unbiased chemist, examining the first sight proves it to be truly the Crown of our Lord. Had any one designed a crown of thorns, either as a wicked or pious imposition, he would have fallen in with the natural idea of a diagem, and all the painters always adopted. Two things he certainly would not have done, first, to make it too large for the head, secondly, and first, to make his crown of thorns out of a circle of thornless reeds.

To vouch fully this seal of authenticity, we should know that it is proved that the Holy Crown at Paris is not a crown of thorns, but a circle of reeds, the "Palmea ballenia, a native growth in hot climates and the circle too large to fit our Lord's head, was only used as a band to keep a support or rest, on which was superimposed a crown of thorns, covering the whole head, and fastened to the reed circle. The theme was a species of bruisile.

This happy discovery explains the exact case of the Crown of Notre Dame—why it differs in kind from branches of thorns preserved elsewhere, which were the crown proper, the true instrument of torture. We are no longer entitled to see at Paris a crown whole and entire, and yet to find small branches from a Thorn Crown as many as 103 different cities of Christendom—the most notable being at Pisa, Treves and Bruges.

That at Treves having came down from St. Helena, has a great character of authenticity, and closely resembles the portion at Pisa.

Who can avoid considering in this connection that strange text of "Judges, 14th verse of 9th chapter "Dayenut ossus lo" Dayenut, Dayenut, ossus, lo, Dayenut, ossus. All the trees said to the bramble, come and rule over us."

It is the very role taken by this shrub on Calvary. There the bramble becomes sign and illustration of the kingship of Jesus Christ, and the royalty of the bramble has written in Jesus own divine blood.

A Trade the Best Fortune.

How often do parents, in choosing companions and suitors for their daughters, ask the question, "Is he rich?" If the husband answers, "Yes, he is rich he is a gentleman, neat in his dress, and can live without work," the parents are pleased. But these qualifications are by no means everything that the husband is to offer, as the following anecdote may serve to show. Not many years ago, a Polish lady, of plebeian birth, but of exceeding beauty and accomplishment, met the eyes of a young prince, who, having her consent, solicited her from her father in marriage, and was refused. We may easily imagine the astonishment of the nobleman. "And why, said he, "is sufficient rank so aspire to you daughter's hand?" "You are undoubtedly, the best blood," replied the father. "And my fortune and reputation," continued the nobleman, "are they not satisfactory?" "Your estate is magnificent, said the father, "and your conduct irreproachable." "Then, having your daughter's consent should I expect a refusal?" said the nobleman. "This will be the happiest day of my life," said the happiness is the chief concern of my life. All the possessions of Fortune are precarious what Fortune gives, at her caprice she takes away. I am no security of independence and a comfortable living for a wife but one, in a word, I am resolved that no one shall be the husband of my daughter who is not at the same time master of an occupation." The nobleman bowed, and retired silently. A year or two afterwards, as the father was sitting at the door, he saw wagons laden with baskets, approaching the house, and at the head of the cavalcade a person in the dress of a basket-maker. And who do you suppose it was? The former suitor of his daughter; the nobleman had turned basket-maker. He was now master of a trade, and had brought the wares made by his hands for inspection, and a certificate from his employer in testimony of his skill. The condition being fulfilled, no further obstacle was opposed to the marriage. But the story is not yet done. The revolution came; fortunes were plundered, and lords were suffered as chaff before the four winds of heaven. Many became beggars—some of them beggars—some of them teachers; but the noble Pole supported his wife, and her father in the infirmities of age, by his basket-making industry.

IRELAND'S RUINED INDUSTRIES.

How England Killed the Cultivation of Tobacco in Ireland.

"The enclosure of tobacco from our fields says the Irish Times, "in one of those fountains of barbarism which has come from a foreign age. Prohibitory laws alone prevent cultivation, the climate and soil being as favorable to its growth as that of potatoes, salad, carrots, and turnips, all of which were here introduced in the same country. The history of this persecuted plant is not without interest. Four hundred years ago tobacco was unknown in Europe. It was first planted in Spain, where it was cultivated as an ornamental plant. In 1560 tobacco was introduced into Italy, and speedily became one of the articles of luxury. Tobacco was first brought to England in 1565, and soon became exceedingly popular, but in 1584 a proclamation was issued by Queen Elizabeth. It had the misfortune to attract the Royal displeasure of her immediate successor, James I., who describes smoking as "a custom loathsome to the eye, hateful to the nose, harmful to the brain, dangerous to the lungs, and in the black stinking fume thereof resembling the horrible Stygian smoke of the pit that is bottomless. Nevertheless this slanderer of one of the few luxuries of the poor neither enacted nor caused to be enacted any laws prohibitory of its growth, and it was not until 1619 that any restriction was imposed upon its growth in Ireland. In that year, however, an Act 12 Car., chapter 24 was passed by the English Parliament, and whilst a Parliament was sitting in Dublin, imposing a penalty of 10 shillings for every rod of ground

ON TOBACCO PLANTED IN IRELAND.

This Act was passed when it was the policy of the English government to encourage the Plantation of North America and to give them the monopoly of supplying the mother country with tobacco. Hence at that day was it did not afford sufficient protection to the colonies, for in three years after it was found necessary to increase the penalty up to £12 a rod, or £96 an acre, yet this seemed to be insufficient to restrain the cultivation of a crop which produced not unfrequently in Ireland over £100 an acre, and accordingly the 22d and 23d Charles II., chapter 26 (England), was passed in 1672, which thereby not alone empowers but orders all constables and other officers under penalties to enter the grounds and pluck up and destroy tobacco plants, after stating that "notwithstanding the former acts passed in that behalf the culture of tobacco was increasing.

ITS ANTIQUITY AND ITS USES.

The growth of tobacco was prohibited. In 1778, however, Lord North, then Prime Minister, embarrassed by the revolt of the American Colonies, sought to win in a way the affections of the Irish people, and forthwith he brought in a bill for the express purpose of substituting their cultivation for that of potatoes. The Earl of Charles II. accordingly by the 19th George III chapter 35, sec. 1 the act prohibiting the growth of tobacco was repealed. Thereafter and from 1779 to 1784 there was a free trade in Ireland for consumption, and for the supply of the English, but not of any foreign market; and so things remained during the 18 years of Irish independence from 1782 to 1800 when the Act of Union, 39 and 40 Geo. III., chapter 38 passed, and by the schedule to the 6th article of that Act the permission of the

CULTIVATE TOBACCO IN IRELAND

was expressly guaranteed. The culture of tobacco then became general, some counties being more suited to its growth than others, the northern counties of Armagh especially. In 1811 the Whig Government resolved to prevent all future growth of the plant, and it introduced a new excise duty, in order that purpose. The debates on the question contain much valuable information, and, as it appears, in opposing the passage of the bill, informed the House that the cultivation of tobacco was a great element in the neighborhood of Enniscorthy, Mr. Lefroy, afterwards Chief Justice, presented a petition in the place of the proposed measure, and observed that the cultivation of tobacco gave employment to a large population. The Ministerial side of the House admitted that there were some proprietors in Ireland who made from £20 to £30 an acre by it. The Act 1st and 2d William IV. then passed, and the Act of Lord North was repealed, and from that day to this a fine of £100 is impossible on any person who shall presume to grow a greater quantity than

ONE POT OR SEVEN-EIGHTH OF A STRIKE.

The tobacco plant is now stamped out of the country, and the Irish peasant, in place of growing his own tobacco on his own land, and for his own use, and for the supply of his own and foreign markets, is contrasted to have recourse to the West Indies and to the Philippine Islands for that which has become one of the necessaries of life. The prohibition of tobacco culture is hardly consistent with the principles of free trade, but the crying evil of France before the Revolution of 1790 was the prohibition on the growth of tobacco, and it was M. Turgot, the financial Minister of Louis XVI. struggled for the free culture of the plant that year laboring to provide Catholic schools in the room of the national institutions established by law, and yet they contributed £13,000, more than twice the amount obtained from Great Britain and Ireland, and more than three times the receipts from the six millions of Catholics in the United States. We are satisfied with both France and Belgium, considering that they have still abundant power to rectify their temporary misfortunes.

Twelve Millions of Acres of Land in Grass.

By a return lately procured by a member of the House of Lords of the twenty millions of acres composing the area of Ireland, there are twelve millions in grass, three and a half millions in tillage, and four and a half millions in waste, much of which is reclaimable. Now, if the English Government were really anxious to increase the wealth of the country, instead of encouraging emigration, they would at once lay the axe to the root of the evil, and, by abolishing the present system of land tenure, and, by abolishing the present system of land tenure, and, by abolishing the present system of land tenure

THE MONITOR.

TWENTY-FOURTH YEAR OF PUBLICATION

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

THURSDAY .... AUGUST 11.

The Pope on Civil Allegiance.

At a time when the world is agitated by insubordination to nearly all constituted authority, it is well for Catholics in every land to hearken to the voice of the successor of St. Peter when he issues an Encyclical Letter in which the Vicar of Christ plainly lays down the Christian law which binds Catholics in obedience to all legitimate authority. The Encyclical which Pope Leo XIII. issued in June last is a document which at this precise time is deserving of the widest publicity, not only for the instruction of Catholics, but more essentially for the benefit of that large class of non-Catholics whose insubordination to all religious teaching has led them into open insurrection against all legitimate civil government. This latter class can only be reached through the medium of the secular press, but that conservator of public polity cannot spare the space necessary to give even a synopsis of any Papal document, no matter how sanitary an effect it might have upon the public generally. Murders, divorces, cases of crim-con., and other congenial topics for public reading, must all be recorded, else the public would consider itself cheated out of its legitimate literary rights, and would rise up in rebellion against such a paper that would dare to rip and palm off some valuable advice from the Pope in lieu of the full account of the last drunken orgies of Edith O'Gigman or the equally sensuous grasping Havazzi. These things the people of the world want have. The Pope's advice they can do without, just as they have done without the Pope's religion for centuries, and yet flatter themselves that they are followers of Jesus Christ even when their scourge, spit upon, and all but crucify His Vicegerent upon earth! The world wants no advice from Pope, prelate or priest in this "enlightened" age. And so far from obeying the advice coming from ecclesiastical authority ordained of God, the world would act in direct opposition to clerical counsel, upon the diabolical plea of modern infidelity that "ecclesiasticism is dead, its age has passed," and the world is too wise to longer listen to the ravings of one whom they sacrilegiously style "the old man of the Vatican."

In ages gone by, when faith was a living principle among Catholics, the words of the Holy Father were treasured in the hearts of the faithful as the advice of the holiest and the wisest of the earth, but in modern times so many Catholics have become debeautalized through contact with the Protestant and pagan world that they spurn an Encyclical of the Sovereign Pontiff as something entirely beneath their concern and entirely unworthy their attention. Through this spirit of insubordination the words of wisdom flowing from ecclesiastical authority fall like so many dead leaves at the feet of the very children of the Church who trample them beneath their feet in order to illustrate to their non-Catholic neighbors how utterly they despise Papal interference in what they call "politics," and furthermore to show how emancipated they have become from what they popularly style "the trammels of ecclesiasticism." This is nothing more nor less than rebellion against the Vicar of Christ, prompted by pride, aided by the seductive influence of Satan; and the Catholic who gives way to it stultifies his conscience, weakens his faith, and endangers his salvation.

We want every reader of the MONITOR to peruse carefully each word, sentence and paragraph of the latest Encyclical Letter, and our reason for this request is based upon the fact that they will learn therefrom their duties to the government under which they live; they will also prove their respect for the Holy See, and they will become better Catholics and thereby better citizens. The Father of the faithful foresees the coming danger which threatens society through Socialism, Communism, Nihilism, and the other legitimate offspring of Protestantism—which was the original enemy of legitimate authority, and from the evil teachings of which has sprung the insubordination in society and the civil chaos in which the world is steeped at present.

Dangers threaten society on every side in consequence of the drifting away of the people from correct Christian principles and the consequent spread of infidelity. As the Sovereign Pontiff truly says, such people "are unwilling to refer all authority to God as its author, and thereby they show a willingness to rob authority of its greatest splendor, and to cut out its very sinews." Catholic faith and practice alone can save society in such a crisis, and this faith will be cheered and strengthened in every heart by the perusal of the Pontifical document which we print on the inside page of the present issue.

Progress of the Church in Wales.

The Church is slowly but steadily spreading in Wales where it was almost completely crushed out of existence by the persecution which marked the days of the cruel and relentless Reformation. Father Joseph Moeller, S. J., who died recently at St. Beuno's College, North Wales, was the means of receiving from fifty to sixty converts yearly, through his own personal missionary efforts, and his death reveals the pleasing intelligence that hundreds of the Welsh people are annually embracing the Catholic faith. Very Rev. J. Jones, Provincial of the Jesuits in Wales, recording the death of this soldier of the Cross, says that the Jesuits in North Wales number twenty-three and as the secular clergy are numerous throughout other portions of the country, we may be assured that the true faith is well propagated.

A New Feature in the Knownothing Party.

Frank Pixley is happy, and the cause of his jubilation arises from the fact that the recently revived Knownothing squad in this State has received a valuable auxiliary in the person of Judge W. K. Green, of Oakland, who presides in the Superior Court, Alameda county. If we are to believe the published utterances of this man ally to the Pixleyanthrax, the Judge carries his Knownothing proclivities upon the bench where he catechises every candidate for citizenship, and refuses to issue natural ization papers to all applicants who do not answer his questions "intelligently," as his native-American honor requires. By this action Judge Green places himself above the law solely for the purpose of preventing adopted citizens from participating of the rights and privileges bestowed upon them by the law of the land, and also in order to gratify the intense bigotry which animates him in his hatred of foreigners in general, and Catholics in particular.

It appears that about three weeks ago an Irishman named Fannon appeared before this Judge for the purpose of becoming naturalized, so Judge Green proceeded to propound a number of questions to him, which Mr. Fannon not having answered to the satisfaction of this Dogberry, he refused to issue his naturalization papers and dismissed him with this imperious decision:

"Well, I don't think you understand the principles of this government at all, and I want you to go away and make yourself somewhat acquainted with them, and when you think you have done so, come back, and I will have your naturalization papers issued to you."

Subsequently Mr. Fannon returned, and having been put upon the judicial rack for torture, Judge Green again refused to issue his naturalization papers to him, and turned him from the court with this additional native-American counsel

"We native-born men be in this country twenty-one years before we can vote, and we study that all the time. I don't see why I should make you equal to one who has lived here twenty-one years and studied the principles of our Government all the time. From the natural ize you until you furnish me some evidence that you understand the duties of a citizen of this republic, or can tell the difference between a republic and a monarchy.

And with this parting injunction from the prejudiced Judge, this Irishman left the useful presence. How Pixley must have been the case of Hop Ho, or Sam Lee, or any other of the Chinese millions had applied to Judge Green. Doubtless he would have received them with open arms and hailed each of them as "a man and a brother," upon the native-American principle that they could be used as a power whereby to sustain monopoly in its efforts to over-ride the populace in this country. Vassalage of the people is the first principle of a monied aristocracy, and the sight of the future in this land will be based upon the supremacy of monopoly or the independence of the working masses. In this conflict the Chinese hordes will be a valuable auxiliary to the giant that intends to ride in a golden chariot roughshod over the laboring millions of white citizens; and as a large portion of that labor is performed by citizens of Irish birth whose votes are antagonistic to the schemes of monopoly, Pixleyanaics like Judge Green are determined that this element shall hereafter be deprived of the benefits of naturalization, if the use dont of such prejudiced persons as Judge Green can prevent it.

Fortunately, however, the law is higher than the court, and although Judge Green may not be able to discover reasons why Ar should naturalize foreigners whom he hates, there are hundreds of upright and impartial judges throughout the land who will not stoop to drag the ermine of the bench in the filthy pool of proscriptive Knownothingism, and we hope when next there occurs a vacancy in the judiciary where Judge Green officiates, the voters of that district will fill his place with a judge who will not allow his private animosity to prevail over the law of the land regarding the rights of foreign-born citizens in matters of naturalization.

"Beer at Picnics."

Under the above caption we find the following dispatch in the city papers of Tuesday:

NEW YORK, August 9th.—Monsignor Stetson, of St. Joseph's church, Jersey City, holds a picnic on the 28th of August, and at it beer will be sold. Father Hennessy, pastor of the adjoining parish, takes exception to this conduct of Monsignor, saying that the picnic "should not be held on the holy festival of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary, and the priest will be responsible for the sale of beer.

Monsignor replies: "The Catholic Church in America is to be conducted according to American principles, not on European principles. Father Hennessy is ignorant of the American idea and method. He thinks he must govern his parish here as he would in Ireland, and all he has to do is to bring out the Irish shillelah, and cry to parishioners 'prohibition,' and they must submit like slaves. He won't treat men like dogs. This cannot be done in America, and I say emphatically, it shall not be done here in the Catholic Church, so far as any of my influence can go. I am an American first of all. I have travelled in Europe and have lived there, and nowhere have I seen the right hand of good fellowship extended so freely as I have in America. I have been installed even in Italy and Spain, but never in America. I am passionately devoted to American institutions. They appeal to the reason of man, and so I say that in this country these must be applied to the government of Lot Catholic Church. We must use persuasion in intention and education. We must appeal to the sense of the people and not drive them like dogs or hold the shillelah over their heads. I am trying the American plan; Hennessy the European. I have no objection to immigrants, but I do object to their coming here to pick up the European method. We shall have our parish, and I shall not prohibit beer by any means."

We reproduce the above in order to show Catholics how entirely unreliable are the vaporings of the news agent of the Associated Press in any matters pertaining to the Church. The Monsignor "Stetson" is a myth, there being no such dignitary in the Church in America, but we presume the person intended to be indicated as the author of such an outpouring of un-Christian bitingness is Right Rev. Robert Seton, of St. Joseph's church, Jersey city. That this dignitary of the Church ever used the horrible language attributed to him, we cannot for a moment believe, as no priest would be guilty of such an absurd declaration as this: "I am passionately devoted to American institutions. They appeal to the reason of man, and so I say that in this country these ideas must be applied to the government of the Catholic Church. Dr. Seton knows too well the discipline of the Church to place it on a plane with what is indelicately described as "American institutions, as the government of the Church has never been based upon the ideas of any civil government, but is distinctly supreme in its own domain and not fashioned after the principles of any political confederation or any distinctive mark of royalty or republican forms of government.

The insulting allusion to the "shillelah" is another mark by which we can discover the clown fool of the enemy in this dispatch, and as soon as the Eastern papers are received our readers will learn that the whole matter has been manufactured through motives of malice.

The Danger of the Future.

It seems that the Pope is not the only authority in Europe who sees the wave of irreligion and lawlessness that threatens to overthrow society in the world. Lord Sandon recently addressed a very influential body of Orangemen at Ormskirk, and in the course of his remarks he told them very truly that all movements of a socialistic nature were "mixed up with the spread of irreligion, and with contempt of the God whom our fathers honored. "Therefore, he continued, "what I wish to impress upon you Orangemen is this. Do not spend your strength, intellect, eloquence, zeal, and matchless powers of organization, from which I expect to see still greater results in the future, merely in fighting a foe which is not now the great foe of the future—the Roman Catholic body. Let what you have done in Ireland, Act at your Irish brethren invite me to do in Glasgow, and unite together as a great and strong league in favor of religion, of law, and the purity of our homes, acting even in this with those we differ from in other matters, so that we may preserve the respect for the great God, who rules everything, and the purity of the home, which is assailed by the apostles of revolution, of atheism, and general disturbance, such as the unfortunate man whom, I am happy to say, we prevented from entering the halls of Parliament. Remember this Your great danger is not now the question of the Protestant succession. Every Roman Catholic will tell you he no more looks now to getting a Roman Catholic sovereign, or even getting hold of the Church lands of England, on the other hand, you know perfectly well that it on page of you would wish to recover the old laws which make it impossible for a Roman Catholic to come into Parliament or hold office in the State. The point I wish to bring before you strongly is, for heaven's sake, will you hold true to your own principles. Try and be able to act so that the people should care for religion, should care for order, and should see for the future home in all ranks of society and in all creeds.

The note is taken up in the London Globe in an excellent article, from which we make the following extract

"There are interests," says that paper, "of vital moment to this country which Protestant and Catholic Englishmen are prepared alike to defend, and one of the most earnest, and not the least efficient, champions of religious education among us is Cardinal Manning. . . . The point the course very near to every 'happy England,' the orders has come to be diffused among political factions, even in the British Parliament, and the commission by which a Statesman Radicalism is bribed into cooperation with modern Liberalism . . . Men who see the traces of an inspiration would disintegrate our whole social, political, and religious life."

Dr. Woodbridge on Public Schools

We are delighted to know that Dr. Woodbridge has been reading the MONITOR to some purpose, and has accordingly discovered that "our" public schools are full of defects, which he pointedly alluded to in his discourse on Sunday evening last in the following manner

"At present teachers are placed in positions or discharged according as they had or had not influential friends in the Board. Qualifications, wishes of parents or of the community had no effect. In fact teachers desiring to perform their duty conscientiously, labored under a disadvantage, while such as merely sought to drive the greatest number of credits to their pupils, right or wrong, were at a premium. He did not see that Boards of Education could be so constituted as to remove the present disabilities. To take them out of the hands of men whose hands were in the public purse was impossible. They had to with a double grip. They could not be satisfied. In this city they yielded a paternal authority to nearly three-quarters of a million of dollars per annum. If the schools accomplished the purposes for which they were constituted very few would object to the expense. But it was a universal complaint that they did not. Scarcely any of the pupils are thoroughly grounded in the primary branches of study; for if they are they have learned at home or by reading the popular newspapers, where curiosity to learn what is said or how them out of the social shell of rote and formalism. A variety of studies are attempted, but were treated upon the pupils and their thinking faculties were dwarfed by excessive memorizing. Moral studies were excluded, and if it were so that a sound public sentiment prevailed abroad, maintained by books, newspapers and the churches, our whole American system, national, political, industrial and religious, would fall to ruin. No teacher was due to our city Board of Education that our public principles were maintained. In conclusion the lecturer said he was interested in the duty of ministers to speak out on this subject. To exclude them from the management of the schools, as was generally done now, was to shut out the class that was best educated and most deeply concerned for the welfare of all. The defects mentioned were patent to all. Many would do away with the whole system in their ground. This was wrong; but some way must be found to remedy them.

To such a series of charges of corruption and inefficiency in the management of the public schools, it is not necessary that we should add a single word, as the source from which such charges proceed is sufficient to convince every reader of their truth.

"The Blood of the Martyrs is the Seed of the Church."

When Lord Macaulay, in surveying from the serene heights of British omnipotence the wide field of ecclesiastical history, arrives at the conclusion that the Catholic Church, although, to be sure, "the very master-piece of human wisdom, as after all, "a work of human policy, is only illustrates the powerful partnership Pagan and Pagan proclivities of Protestant polities. The sublime self-sacrifice of the martyrs of the Church of God, the English historian altogether ignores. It may indeed be asked whether works of merely "human policy," unillumined and unsustained by the radiance of holy faith, are calculated to cause many millions of both sexes from age to age to bear testimony even unto death? In contrary mind to speak of the primitive or Apostolic ages, as we are reminded by an eminent convert from Anglicanism, Father Wilberforce, 15,570 members of the Order of St. Dominic died for the faith, while in another age 26,000 of the same Illustrious Order received the crown of martyrdom. Within a period comparatively recent, 55 Franciscan Preachers have been martyred in China. It is safe to affirm that during the last 800 years, 80,000 Dominicans have died for the faith. Nor have the sons of St. Francis and the Society of Jesus failed to emulate their glorious example. The same heroic spirit strengthened from works of "human policy" animated 10,570 natives of Japan converted by the Jesuit missionaries to lay down their lives, within a single year, in defence of Catholic truth. In that country and the Corea the martyrs numbered between two and three millions, while hundreds of thousands have died in the same sacred cause in Britain and Armenia. So much for Lord Macaulay's "work of human policy."

Of the glowing spiritual splendor of Catholicity inside visible in the red current of the martyrs blood, and, to borrow the thought of the Greek poet, gushing in the stream of time, from age to age, bright ages of heavenly youth to make the world less counsial, the literary vision of the British historian fails to discern a gleam. But Macaulay, to be sure, the grandeur glory of England's philosophic pantheon—like Pagan and Protestant "progress" is wholly material in its aim and worship.

The first persecution of the Church dates from the time of Herod the elder, followed, as it was, after some years, by the martyrdom of St. Stephen and the unholy surface in Judea. Then followed the long continued hostility of the Roman Cæsars to the Christian cause, Nero, Decius, Diocletian and Dioclesian, the anti-Christian ensigns rigid with infernal fury. For the first time the Roman arms which had subjugated Carthage, Gaul, Britain, Spain and Greece, were powerless when confronted with the Christian host. In Persia and in Africa the fires of persecution were kindled by the malice of the evil one, and the Satanic strife raged throughout all parts of the Roman Empire. The Arian heresy enthroned at Alexandria, the apostacy of Julian in the seat of Imperial power, the wave of brutal barbarism from Scythia, and the Nestorian heresy alike failed to destroy Christian unity. Nor was the heresy of Luther, in a later age, destined to meet with more success than the previous revolts against the Church founded by the Prince of Martyrs.

"In the primitive ages," observes the Rev. Father Gleeson, in his recently published work entitled "The Trials of the Church, or, the Persecutors of Religion," "the secular clergy alone were the leaders of the faithful in vindicating divine truth. In fact, the great religious communities subsequently called into existence to meet the wants and requirements of the times, had not yet been founded." What the Religious Orders have achieved in the past and are doing in the present for the conversion of nations and the salvation of souls, has been indicated in a former issue of the MONITOR. "As the Portuguese gained their power in Africa and India," says Father Palmer, "to the blood of the Order drenched the land from Cape Verde to Congo, from Sofiola to Zanzibar, in Madagascar, Ormuz, Abyssinia, Arabia and Persia, and all along the coast from the Gulf of Cambay to China." Between 1565 and 1638, there was an almost unbroken chain of Dominican martyrdom by the hands of infidels, Mussulmans, and even of the Dutch in the Sunda Islands, Sumatra, Java, Papua, Flores, Solor, Timor, Maqueen, Doan, in the Molaccas, in Malacca and in Corea. And in the Old World and the New the Franciscan and Jesuit missionaries have, as we have had occasion to remark, been worthy rivals of their Dominican brethren.

In Ireland—alone among the Northern nations faithful to the uncongeared and unchangeable Church—persecution assumed an aspect of infernal atrocity never known before in the annals of human suffering. Pagan persecution of primitive Christianity was outdone by the pious Puritans of England. It was during three hundred years the sin of England, drunk with the blood of the martyrs, to extirpate the ancient faith of the Irish people. In view of the persecution of Catholics during the early Christian ages, Father Gleeson truly says that "of all nations Ireland has been the most faithful and true to the faith of Christ." Nor in our own time is Irish loyalty to the Holy See a "mere antique." Famine, indeed, rallied by red-handed cruelty, killed numerous, and point with mournful pride to the memorials of her former spiritual sway, from the snows of Canada and Labrador to the cotton fields of Louisiana. The splendid monuments of the olden ecclesiastical grandeur of Spain in the Indies, albeit in decay, attest the vanished glory of a once great Catholic nation. What Irish devotion to the interests of religion has accomplished in this country we all know. And it has been reserved for the sons of Catholic Ireland in their march from the Canges to the Indus to conquer regions where the French and Spaniards never penetrated, to raise the banner of the Cross in triumph beneath strange skies, in spite of centuries of persecution in their own land and the cold shadow of Protestant ascendency in the vast Asiatic dominions of the British crown to rear under the walls of ancient Mahomedan and Hindoo cities, the altar of God, and to plant the symbol of salvation, under Irish Captains and Presonnels like Lord Kenne, Lord Clough, Lord Lawrence and Sir Frederick Roberts, on the citadel of Cabul and the heights of Candahar.

Nor should it be forgotten that in India, during the sanguinary Sepoy struggle of 1857-58, Irish priests suffered martyrdom under the cross of Nana Sahib, the representative of the combined power of Islam and the Mahratta Confederacy.

The Sepulchre of Pius IX.

Rome now possesses another shrine of a confessor of the faith, and one which will be visited by thousands of pilgrims to the Eternal City for ages yet to come. The remains of a Pontiff who will be known in the future annals of the Church as Pius the Great, rest in the humble church of St. Lawrence Without the Walls, for which the deceased had always cherished great veneration. There, adjacent to the hallowed slab which is consecrated in consequence of its hallowed associations and the stains of the blood of martyrs, rest the remains of one who, as all the Pontiffs through nineteen centuries, reigned longer than the Prince of the Apostles. Nevertheless an impression prevails that the lasting fame of Pius IX., whose humble Christian heart contained the whole world, will not be in the immortality of his temporal rule, but in the heroic and sublime Pontiff, who, when he was deprived of his temporal power, said, "Pray for him—that crowness the I. H. S. Holy priest.

Importance of Catholic Schools.

Archbishop Corrigan of Jersey City, is reported by the New York Sun to have said in his sermon Sunday week "It will tell you what is forbidden by the Bishop of the Province, by the Archbishop of the United States, assembled in the Plenary Council at Baltimore—forbidden by the Sovereign Pontiff of the Pope. It is forbidden to build a $100,000 church and a magnificent residence for the pastor, and to have no Catholic school in the parish. Such a thing is a Christian crime. Nero, Decius, Diocletian and Dioclesian, the anti-Christian ensigns rigid with infernal fury. For the first time the Roman arms which had subjugated Carthage, Gaul, Britain Spain and Greece, were powerless when confronted with the Christian host. In Persia and in Africa the fires of persecution were kindled by the malice of the evil one, and the Satanic strife raged throughout all parts of the Roman Empire. The Arian heresy enthroned at Alexandria, the apostacy of Julian in the seat of Imperial power, the wave of brutal barbarism from Scythia, and the Nestorian heresy alike failed to destroy Christian unity. Nor was the heresy of Luther, in a later age, destined to meet with more success than the previous revolts against the Church founded by the Prince of Martyrs.

Sad Condition of the North of Ireland.

A Rev. George W. Pepper, an American Presbyterian clergyman lat a pronounced Irish patriot, recently made a travelling through the North of Ireland of which he says

"I have just returned from the Continent of Europe, and now know Protestant Ireland as much beggary, worse sin wretchedness, as much absolute degradation as even in the so-called Papist South and West. Nowhere There are hundreds of those Protestant far mers who never eat an egg, a chicken, meat or food—and all must be sold to pay the landlord. Great God! How long must this be? Why, sir, there is enough material in this sentence to make a hundred martyrs Every man I met, all Protestants, is threatening to leave Ireland, and I am sick of the gospel of "land for the landless" "Ireland for the Irish" a gospel which the heavens and the earth are preaching—shall be universally embraced and practically enforced.

The Sisters of Notre Dame.

At the ten o'clock Mass in the chapel of the Training College, Mount Pleasant, Liverpool, on Sunday recently, the Rev. Father Clare, in the course of his sermon, alluded to the twenty-fifth anniversary of the college which they were now celebrating, and the immense good these schools had been instrumental in doing. He referred to the immense benefits which had accrued from the order of the Sisters of Notre Dame, of which Mere Julie Billiart was the foundress, as some proof of which he mentioned that within the last quarter of a century no fewer than one hundred houses for the education of the children of the masses had been established by them in various parts of the world. From the Mount Pleasant Training College alone, in that period, there had been sent out as many as 1,200 teachers who had passed the examination of the Government inspectors, and it was calculated that at the present time the teachers who had been trained in that institution were giving instruction and training to 52,000 children. Under such circumstances it was meet that those who took an interest in the college should rejoice over the great work it had done, and was still doing, for the souls of Catholics in that locality, and they should thank God for having given to them Mere Julie as the foundress of the order. The Sisters of Notre Dame have several educational institutions in this State and the reputation as teachers given them in Liverpool is well maintained by the representatives of the Community on this coast.

The Pope's Imprisonment.

Archbishop Hannan of Halifax recently returned from Rome and was welcomed by his people on his arrival with demonstrations of respect and joy. In reply to an address of welcome, his Grace thanked the clergy and laity, and in closing his remarks he touched lightly on the imprisonment of the Sovereign Pontiff and the dangers which menaced him

"Notwithstanding, said his Grace, "can live in Rome for any time she must not see that the Head of the Church is a captive in his own palace, and that, if he were to leave it, he would only subject himself to insults and indignities from a fierce ruthless and hostile power. Within a few feet of the stairs by which the Vatican is entered stand the soldiers of the traitor king. It was needless to tell them, as they were all familiar with it, of the thousands of Religious of both sexes driven out into the world their churches and convents seized. He (Grace) said that he would be able to refer to other matters of much more interest than the prison of the pulpit, also to the other scenes and places visited by him during his stay in England and Ireland."

How to Teach Bigots.

The Pittsburgh Catholic, in commenting on the recent veto of the Liberty of Conscience bill by Gov. Cornell, of New York, says

By calling attention in the columns of the Catholic press of the country to the doings of fanatics, especially of official fanatics, and more particularly still, to persons holding exalted stations in the State or nation, a concert of action is established which is calculated that would redound to the best interest of the cause which Governor Cornell, and those who think as he does, assail. The Catholic press of the country ought to be a unit in published sentiment against bigotry. If it were or would adopt the policy we suggest, the force of the opinion generated by the Catholics of the United States, as represented by their press, would produce a counter feeling that would bring bigots to their senses. What the press is surely powerful enough to pull the nose, metaphorically speaking, of a tribe of fanaticism, if the press, Catholic and intelligent, organized, exactly and nothing would give the press more than to submission a dose of bitter medicine to the invalids weakened by sickly disease. It would surely do the good, and there is no doubt that it would give more comfort and many rights yet denied to Catholics and Jews.

TOPICS OF THE TIMES.

The Bishops of Belgium, in order to perpetuate their tyranny, propose to pass a law naturalizing all foreigners in Belgium who will take the oath of Belgian allegiance, the larger part of the foreign population being freethinkers. A large part of the Belgian people, if the law be passed, they would have votes enough to exert a very powerful influence on questions in which the Church is particularly interested, and they are to be called in Christian principles. The present bigots are sorely vexed at the hundred times more than two hundred and fifty thousand these trade Catholic confessions, and no wonder they are so anxious to keep the Belgian people out of the way Catholics could in Catholic affairs.

ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST'S SOCIETY

The annual meeting of St. John the Baptist Society, attached to St. Ignace church, Lake Calhoun parish, was held August 7th. The following named were elected officers for the ensuing term: President, Thomas Dolan; Vice President, T. J. Walsh; Recording Secretary, M. Coughlin; Financial Secretary, H. Monahan; Sergeant-at-arms, James Huber. The following named were elected as Marshals: Messrs. Cullen, Dolan, Walsh, Huber, Hughes, Ryan, Ryan, Ryan Famous Trees.

Certain trees throughout the world have, for one reason or another, become historic, and a great many now are known only in history. Others still live and have gained a world wide celebrity. One of these natural old landmarks, the fame of which is known far and wide, is the "Thousand Mile Tree," on the Pacific Railroad. This tree stands entirely alone in an otherwise treeless prairie, and marks the one thousandth mile of the overland route.

Another of Nature's historical landmarks known to the world, is in Germany. The natives of Frevenkirk, in Nassau, cherish this gnarled and twisted tree, which has the queer peculiarity of shedding drops of liquid which resemble blood, whenever a bough or branch is broken off. This strange phenomenon is explained by the peasants by thrilling tales of early martyrdom of saints, whose blood spilled beneath its shade has been sucked up with the nourishment drawn from the earth and has become disseminated as sap through the branches. In New Orleans, on Orleans Street, there is another tree which is surrounded in tragedy. It is a palm of large size, and is the only one in the city, and is the subject of many legends. It is looked upon with deep interest by travellers, while the negroes regard it with superstitious reverence.

A Western Farmer.

An Ohio paper gives the following description of the Western farmer:—"The average Western farmer toils hard early and late, often depriving himself of needed rest and sleep—for what? To raise corn. For what? To feed hogs. For what? To get money with which to buy more land. For what? To raise more corn. For what? To feed more hogs. For what? To buy more land. And what does he want with more land? Why, he wishes to raise more corn—to feed more hogs—to buy more land—to raise more corn—to feed more hogs—and in this circle he moves until the Almighty stops his hoggish proceedings.

How to Feed Farmers.

A New Jersey correspondent of the Germantown Telegraph says:

In hot weather, when all the men are overworked and cannot take hearty food, then is is when we find it most difficult to please. Good cold milk, not skimmed until blue, is very acceptable, and ice cream for dessert sometimes instead of pies and puddings. Something cool is preferred. I have seen my father almost too tired to eat, who at sight of the frozen mass would brighten up and say: "Daughter, this is nice." This was full pay for my share of the trouble. We find some cold meat, bread and butter with stewed fruit or apple butter, tea or coffee, nicely put on the table, and made to look inviting, are all that is needed. What we merely have to eat is not all; the way it is served, and for the women to look tidy, not as if they had no friends, too tired and cross to enjoy what is before them, without a pleasant word for those around them, add a great deal.

Importance of Cooking.

Cooking is a far more important matter than the general run of people suppose. Married men sometimes come to realize the importance of the subject when, unfortunately, it is too late to apply a remedy. An American lady of Chicago, Miss Ewing, has been lately lecturing on the subject to some purpose. She says that "The wife of a devoted husband is always a good cook, intemperance, profanity, disgust of home life—all are born of bad cooking." To say great extent all this is true. Let any married man ask himself the question, and deny our assertion if he can. To our young men we say, let your beloved one be handsome, ugly, accomplished, or ignorant, or what she may; but, above all things, let her be an adept in cookery. A good cook, at the head of a family, is a joy forever—a prize beyond all value—a preserver of peace and good will in the family circle, whose importance could not be overrated.

A True Anecdote.

A few years ago a priest was preaching to soldiers in a garrison town. After the sermon a Scotch soldier entered the sacristy and said: "Father, I should like to be a Catholic."

After some conversation it was agreed that he should come regularly for instruction. The first time he did so he said: "Father, I have a question to ask—What became of our Lord's Mother! I never can think that she died and was buried like other people."

The priest then taught him the Catholic doctrine concerning Our Lady's death and assumption.

His face brightened. "Well, Father," he said, "I always thought it must have been something like that."

When his instructions were finished the Feast of Our Lady's Presentation was at hand, and on that day he was received into the Church.

The priest asked him one day the date of his birth, and he answered: "I was born on August the 15th, in the year——"

"Do you know what great F ast of the Blessed Virgin falls on August 15th?"

"No, Father."

"It is the Feast of Our Lady's Assumption."

The good soldier was greatly pleased; and on the next 15th of August he carried a banner of Our Lady in a procession. He is now a practical Catholic.

A School Boycotted.

An Irish paper, of a recent date says: Yesterday, the inhabitants of the town of Bantry were rather astonished to see some fifty or sixty boys and girls from the Kilkeal National School (about five miles from the town) march through the street, bearing green boughs and cheering loudly. They were divided into two sections, each under the charge of a monitor, and marched four deep up to Mr. Gibbonly's house, and cheered for the secretary of the Land League. After parading through the streets they departed to their homes. The cause of this unusual demonstration was the boycotting of a National school at Kilkeal in consequence of the son of a farmer named Connors, who had given evidence against Mr. T. M. Healy, M.P., at the Winter Assizes, attending the school.

Family Fun.

Topnoody's Mistake.

Topnoody made up his mind that he was not going to be lowed any longer by his wife, so when he went home at noon he called out imperiously "Mrs. Topnoody, Mrs. Topnoody!" Mrs. T. came out of the kitchen with a drop of sweat on the end of her nose, a dishrag tied around her head, and rolling pin in her hand. "Well, sir" she said, "what'll you have?" Topnoody staggered, but braced up. "Mrs. Topnoody, I want you to understand, mainsir and be tapped his breast dramatically—"I am the engineer of this establishment." "Oh, you are, are you? Well, Topnoody, I want you to understand that I—and she looked dangerous—"I am the boiler that will blow up and sling the engineer over into the next county. Do you hear the steam escaping, Topnoody? Topnoody heard it, and he meekly inquired if there was any assistance he could render in the housework.

Paying For His Whistle.

Not many years ago, when a lofty building was on the point of completion, the man was in the habit of whistling at his laborers who attended him whenever he wanted a fresh supply of lime, and, as the scaffold on which he wrought was rather small, this occurred very often during a day's job. A joiner who was fitting a window immediately noticing Pat, answer dutifully to every call from the mason, thought of playing a trick on him by imitating the whistle, and thus brought him up with a handful of mortar when there was no room for it. The mason told Pat that he had not whistled, so he had no other alternative than to trudge back with the load. This having occurred the third time during the day, Pat thought he would watch to hear where the whistle came from.

He had not waited long with the hod on his shoulder when he heard the identical whistle underneath where he stood, and leaning over he saw the head of the joiner protruding out of the window immediately below. Pat, without more ado, emptied the hod over the whistler's head. The joiner yelled and sputtered while attempting to clear himself from the adhesive mass, and in the midst of his confusion heard Pat above shouting at the top of his voice—

"Whistle when you want some more mortar!"

Little Laughlets.

—"I fear," said a country curate to his flock "when I explained to you in my last charity sermon that philosophy was the love of our species, you must have misunderstood my text; specie, which may account for the smallness of the collection."

—When an old backwoodsman was about to take his first ride on the Mississippi steamer he was asked whether he would take lock or calm passage. "Well," said he, in a resigned sort of way, "I've lived all my life in a cabin, and I guess calm passage will be good enough for a rough chap like me."

—"Would you like to be a bird, Tommy, some morning, pondered" asked the polite dry goods clerk, as he flung some glazy black fabrics before a serious lady customer. "No, mamma, I would not, I would rather be a morning," she responded; and the clerk was so overcome that he shortly afterward went out to get a beer.

—It was a Boston girl who asked, "Why is the lately lecturing on the subject to some purpose. She says that "The wife of a devoted husband is always a good cook, intemperance, profanity, disgust of home life—all are born of bad cooking." To say great extent all this is true. Let any married man ask himself the question, and deny our assertion if he can. To our young men we say, let your beloved one be handsome, ugly, accomplished, or ignorant, or what she may; but, above all things, let her be an adept in cookery. A good cook, at the head of a family, is a joy forever—a prize beyond all value—a preserver of peace and good will in the family circle, whose importance could not be overrated.

TRUSTWORTHY TESTIMONY.

Some Vital Facts Concerning the Welfare of the Community Made Public.

What Californians Say, and How Their Statements are Confirmed.

[Chronicle.]

Not a few have been made more plainly manifest during the past few years than the important effect which climatic changes have upon the constitutions of American people. The steady growing habits of Europe tend to longer lives, but the influence of European climate towards apoplectic and other similar diseases. On the other hand, the fluctuating habits of the American people more rarely take the nervous centers and other important portions of the body, while severe and sudden changes of the atmosphere add still more to the difficulties to be overcome.

San Francisco, as well as all cities in this and more southern latitudes, is especially subject to such changes, and the necessity for means to cure, particularly at this season of the year, is clearly manifest to every observant person. These facts are especially true with reference to the human kidneys and liver, and the alarming increase of kidney disease and all minor kidney difficulties has caused the subject to be a theme of almost universal conversation. Knowing these facts, and in order that our readers might be more thoroughly informed upon the subject, a representative of this paper called upon a gentleman of some new and important fact, which is herewith presented. Having learned of a remarkable illustration of the subject under consideration, a call was made upon Mrs. N. H. D. Mason at 37 Liberty street, who, upon being questioned, said:

"For a long time my daughter had suffered with Albuminuria, and she was treated by the best physicians in this city and in Oakland, but she failed to find any relief. When chosen one of the lower extremities set in we were in despair, and considered her disease incurable, in fact we felt that her case was utterly hopeless. Thinking that a change of climate might be the means of alleviate her sufferings, and being the only remaining effort that I could make in her behalf, I started with her for Southern California. While on the steamer we met Mr. Wm. Sherman of New York, who earnestly recommended the use of Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure for my daughter's disease, and told of several remarkable cures that had come under his observation in the East from the use. Although strongly opposed to the use of proprietary medicines, and having but little faith in their efficacy, I was persuaded by the Doctor's faith in this remedy to at least give it a trial. She commenced to improve after taking the first three bottles, and from that time on her improvement was rapid, until we were on older her cured. Her general health is now excellent, and I feel that too much cannot be said in favor of this remarkable remedy which has done so much for her.

At this point of the interview a young lady of bright and animated appearance entered the room and addressed a few words to Mrs. Mason. After her departure Mrs. Mason said:

"That was my daughter, who was once an invalid; does she look very sick now?"

The reporter expressed his surprise that a person once so hopelessly ill could ever present such a healthy and healthy appearance, but was assured that such was the case.

"Do you feel, Mrs. Mason, that you owe her recovery entirely to the use of this remedy?"

"I do most assuredly. I do not think she could have lived six months had I not used it; and so great is my faith in it that I unhesitatingly recommend it to all who are in any degree suffering from kidney or liver complaint.

A call was then made on Mr. C. A. Page, No. 1305 Leavenworth street.

"I understand, Mr. Page, that you have had some experience regarding the effects of our remedy, and a stronger hold on me. My weight was reduced from 185 to 120 pounds. I friend, knowing my condition, advised me to try Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure. Anxious to relief, I ordered some, and began to try it. Two days after commencing it I experienced decided relief and continued to gain better from that time."

"Then you think you owe your present health to this cure?"

"Yes, sir. It has done more for me than all the doctors or quinsy combined. I consider it the greatest medicine of the age for Kidney and Bladder difficulty.

The next person visited was Mr. Charles E. Burgess, No. 121 Berkeley Way. For a few years my wife has been troubled with derangement of the kidneys. She was all the time growing worse, and at times was completely prostrated. Her limbs had become stiff, and the desire for natural relief was as often as every ten minutes. For the last month she has suffered as have been beyond description, and she has often prayed for death to release her from her sufferings. Her physicians during this time, some of them the most prominent in the city, but they could give her no help. One day I found a pamphlet of Warner's Safe Remedies in my front yard, and took it into my wife. She had formerly lived in Albany, N. Y., and recommended some of the names attached to the testimonials in it. She thought she would like to try his medicine, and so I got her a bottle of Safe Kidney and Liver Cure, and also a bottle of Safe Nervine. It took three doses of Nervine the first night to put her to sleep, the next night only one. The Safe Kidney and Liver Cure has relieved her so much that she can now sleep all night without taking anything. She has taken three bottles of Kidney and Liver Cure, and now feels perfectly well, although she will continue to use it for some time to completely eradicate the disease from her system. I feel that the people of such a wonderful cure should be known to the thousands throughout the land that are suffering from Kidney and Liver Complaint, and say one sufferer from Kidney Complaint, or wishing to know more of the results of this remedy, is at liberty to call upon me, or address me on the subject, and I will cheerfully tell them all it has done for my wife.

Mr. J. L. Knapp of Santa Clara said: "I was taken sick with catarrhal or acute inflammation of the bladder. My sufferings were intense and I was often obliged to get up from ten to fifteen times during the night, when my agony would be so great that I was almost bereft of reason. I employed the best medical aid, both homeopathic and allopathic, but was pronounced by all incurable. They said I could not live long, and I thought myself that my time on earth was drawing to a close and gave up all hopes of recovery. My son in St. Louis, knowing how sick I was, sent me some papers containing reports from several of the St. Louis leading physicians and testimonials from a number of citizens concerning the cures resulting from the use of Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure and urged me to try it. I got some of the medicine and immediately commenced to use it. After taking a few bottles I found myself rapidly improving until I can now say I am cured.

"What do your physicians say about your recovery?"

"Only a short time ago I met Dr. Carpenter and said to him, 'What do you think of the effect of Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure?' He answered, 'I think that medicine one of a thousand and the way it has acted in your case.'"

In an interview with Mr. William Sesse of Stockton the following facts peculiar to his case were stated:

"For years ago I was obliged to give up my business on account of sickness, which seemed to be a complication of Kidney and Liver complaints. My liver was greatly enlarged and appeared to be growing hard until at last it felt like a stone. It also appeared growing fast to my side. My right side was almost paralyzed. My body was so bloated I could not wear my clothes, and I was confined to my bed. My sufferings were intense, the best physicians pronounced my case incurable, and said it was only a question of time when I must die. While in this condition I commenced the use of Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure. The first bottle gave me relief, and I continued to take it, and steadily improved. The swelling left my arms first, and the hardness to leave my liver, until now it has reached its normal condition. My right side is again strong. It is hard not been for this medicine I should now be in my grave."

But one conclusion can be drawn from the above facts by any fair minded individual. That conclusion must be that while Kidney and Liver difficulties are so alarmingly increasing, still there is a safe and certain means by which they can be avoided, or, having been contracted, a way by which they can positively be cured.

Redpath in Ireland.

ENGLISHMEN IN SYMPATHY WITH THE LAND LEAGUE MOVEMENT.

Bold Expressions from an English Democrat.

From the third letter of James Redpath we extract the following interesting details of events at present transpiring in Ireland.

DUBLIN, July 11, 1881.

The history of the English in Ireland, (even as told by their ablest and most eloquent apologist, James Anthony Froude,) is one of the most appalling narratives of unscrupulous and continuous crime in the annals of modern times. A new chapter and a bright one is opening. The English Democracy are now engaged in investigating the condition of Ireland and the reason why the Irish hate England. It is equally amusing and gratifying to hear their expressions of surprise at their unexpected discoveries of the grievances of the Irish peasantry, and of indignation against the English ruling class-maligners of the Irish race.

Some time since a deputation of NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM MINERS were sent by their trade associations into the West of Ireland "for the purpose," as they state, "of seeing the actual condition of the Irish peasantry." Mr. John Byron was the President of the Northumberland Miner's Association, an Mr. W. H. Patterson was the Financial Secretary of the Durham Miner's Association. They made a report on their return to the North of England. As they told the simple truth in the homeliest words, their account created a profound sensation among the wealthy men. Secretary Forster felt called on to deny its accuracy. Their report was investigated and it was found to be correct. A number of English Radicals then contributed a fund to enable them, and a companion named Mr. Birkett, to return and continue their investigations in Ireland. They are travelling now, and they are making speeches for which Mr. Parnell and Mr. Bigar would be imprisoned at once.

THE "DEMOCRATIC FEDERATION" OF ENGLAND has also deputed six men and two ladies "to find out the true state of things in Ireland." This "Democratic Federation" represents, according to Miss Craigan, one of the lady deputies, "Ten thousand English working men."

The Irish people are treating these Volunteer Investigating Committees hospitably, as their habit is with all strangers; and those inquiring friends, also, are everywhere espousing their cause and reporting their wrongs. One of them is reported to have gone so far as to say in a public speech at Loughrea, yesterday, that the "landlord system, as developed at a sheriff's sale he had witnessed, was legalized robbery," and his accurate added, that "that an English man he would not be afraid to take up a rifle in defence of Irish rights."

It is one of the most hopeful signs of the times for Ireland.

THE FOURTH OF ENGLAND FITMEN in their first report relate their experience in Galway. I will quote a single illustration of their personal experiences. They met a tenant in Galway whose family had lived on a farm for more than a century.

"On this farm," they report, the man had spent the money he had saved by extraction, in improving the land and farm buildings which were rendered as good as possible; but not one farthing did the owner of the land lay out upon it—his agent merely meeting his tenant at rent day and taking the rent, or paying flying visits to the land to see how it was looking. About ten years ago the narrator's father died, and it then became necessary to have the name of the man inserted in the agreement as the successor of the farm. Instead of congratulating him on the improvements made on the land and exhorting him to walk in the footsteps of his father in taking care of his landlord's property, the agent told his visitor that as his land was in good condition he would have to submit to in his rent. In other words he would have to pay an increase of 12s. for every acre he tilled, and what his father paid 16s. 6d. per acre for, the son would now have to pay 28s. 6d. [for]. — Had the father paid the profits he derived from his farm into his pocket he would have been able to leave it to his son to start him either on the farm or in some other pursuit with capital in his hand. Having, however, put it into the land, he had not only handed it over to the landlord, but his agent had furnished the latter with an excuse for harrassing and impoverishing his son.

AN INCREASE OF 50 PER CENT.

"This incident" the honest gentlemen say "was neither more thrilling or more masked in its incidents than

THE OTHERS STORIES WE HEARD."

Such incidents are not the exception, but the rule, in the West of Ireland.

The gentlemen gave realistic descriptions or the villages and cabins of Connemara, where the landlords have rushed in with sheriffs where even Cromwell trod with pity.

At other report in all likelihood will never reach America, I will quote a few passages from their account of Barna, in the county of Galway, presuming that I have myself seen many villages in the West of Ireland that are equally wretched.

"Ugh there were none. The poor poor people supported themselves by lifting their wretched patches of land, or by fishing in the waters of Galway Bay, which roll in at their doors. . . . A few wretched poultry and a donkey or two, together with the boats and a scanty supply of lines and nets for fishing, and the spade and tools for delving the soil, appeared to form the sole wealth of the poor creatures. Strange sights we saw in the huts, about a dozen of which we visited in the few hours we were in the village."

From a subsequent letter of this distinguished American journalist we copy the following interesting details of scenes he heard of in sorrowing Erin:

CONFERENCE WITH CAPTAIN BELL.

I saw in Castlebar the most the other day a tall, swarthy gentleman who was mistaken by himself unconsciously conspicuous by wearing a soft felt hat—the sacred emblem of our nationality abroad. I could not decide from his looks whether he was a Westerner or a Southerner, and so I made his acquaintance, and found that both guesses were correct: that he was Captain Bell, of Dyrce, Illinois, married been a sharpshooter in our army, while his father had been a Brigadier-General in the Southern army. He is a man of education and intelligence, and I learned that, like myself, he had been both a journalist and lecturer at home. He has been in Ireland two months, traveling about all the time, mostly on jaunting cars, in the south and south-west.

He came to Ireland as I came at first, and as all the English deputations confess that they came with a very scant supply of sympathy for the political sufferings of the Irish people, and with the feeling that while the Irish might have some wrongs, their English rulers were probably in no way responsible for them. But, like the rest of us, the scales have fallen from his eyes.

"What do you think of Irish landlordism," I asked, "and English rule in Ireland now?"

"I think injustice," he replied, "is a very mild name for it—the whole thing is based on crime. I could not believe that any people would endure such wrongs patiently. Talk about the clamor, the discontent, the impatiently of the Irish, no people on earth could be more submissive under such atrocious tyranny. Those people, the real peasantry, are

ON THE VERGE OF STARVATION.

None of them ever pretend to taste meat, or use their own butter or eggs, or any other marketable produce that they raise. Their food is sour milk and potatoes. Their huts are worse than the huts of the Hottentots, and their clothes—well, they are just a little better than our first parents, yet these poor creatures are vilified, both at home and abroad, because they dare even to complain."

"How about the lawlessness in Ireland—what counties have you seen most of it in?"

"Well," replied Captain Bell, "I've been pretty well through the Counties of Cork, Kerry, Waterford, Limerick, Clare, Tipperary, Galway, and Roscommon, and I only saw one act of violence on the part of the people—I only saw the finale of it, so to speak—and to offset it, I saw what I certainly regarded as a deliberate effort on the part of the Government troops to incite an insurrection, and such a provocation would have been sure to lead to the annihilation of the troops in any part of America. There is no reign of terror in Ireland.

SOMEBODY IS LIFE AND PROPERTY HELD MORE SACRED.

I felt as safe among these wild mountains of Western Ireland as on my own farm near Dixon, Illinois. Every reported crime or outrage, whether true or bogus, and whatever its cause, is not only grossly exaggerated, but attributed to political disaffection. It's careless boy shies a pebble at a window pane and the lurking shout: If an old woman drops a stone from a window on a policeman the district is proclaimed! If a drunken brawler gets into a row with a neighbor, in a personal difficulty, the country is overrun with troops, and some Land League must be marched to prison."

"What was the act of violence you saw?"

"I was at Blarney village, near Blarney Castle. I was walking out from Cork to see the castle, and I was quite near the village when I saw laboring men running down from the fields to the road, and heard shouts from the direction of the village; and then I saw a man running, or rather pacing—as near a run as he could get; he seemed tired out, and he was stark naked with the exception of one sock, one leg he left he was covered with blood and dirt. As he passed me he was panting and looked frightened to death—his look of terror reminded me of pictures of the dethroned lords in the French revolution. They

"I went on to the village and found that he was a sub-constabulary man. He had used his power, they said, in a very insolent way, and suddenly the exasperated women attacked him, forced him to throw his clothes from him, and then shipped him with furze. He was surrounded by hundreds of furious women. The one farthing fine part: they had stood aloof and shouted and laughed at the women. I understood afterwards that the landlord compromised with these tenants.

MORE CURES AT KNOCK.

From the correspondence of the Dublin Irishman of the 16th ult. we condense the following

On this day (Tuesday) the writer was hauled by an Irish-American pilgrim hand bag that it might be suspended in the sacristan gable. Our Irish-American pilgrim had been suffering for years from a diseased wrist. It had been lanced several times, a half-dozen surgeons had expended their skill in vain upon it, and the poor sufferer had sad sight wherein to trust, the mercy of heaven also excepted. Living in Albany, N. Y., U.S. America, he procured in May, 1880, some of the Knock cement from a friend in New Jersey, and, having applied it to his arm, felt much relieved. With his arm washed and bandaged, he left his American home on road for Knock and arrived here early in May. He had been but nine days when he found his arm all his entirely well. For the first time many weeks he was able to write a letter to his wife—to tell her the glad tidings of his recovery—and to-day he leaves behind him a hand-bag containing the sensible relics of his crutches—he no longer necessary, but gladly, gratefully left behind to hang with a hundred fellows enduring testimony to the power and goodness of our Lady of Knock.

Another and interesting case is the following:

On the eve of the Feast of SS. Peter and Paul, the writer met at Knock a Mr. John Hamilton, who, with his wife, were on a thanksgiving pilgrimage—their son, Willie, a boy of fourteen years, having been cured of a severe injury to one of his ankles, and cured through the agency of the precious cement. Here follow the circumstances:

While Hamilton, Tullyhagh, Tubbercurry, Co. Sligo, was playing with his companions on Ascension Thursday, May 5, 1880, when he severely hurt his ankle by a false step or some such movement. On the inside of the foot the dislocation or displacement of the bone was most markedly evident, and a large lump formed out on the inner ankle. The doctor of the district treated the sufferer with blistering, etc., but without good result, and another practitioner, into the country town, examined the case, and suggested remedies. Those latter, however, our Lady of Knock rendered unnecessary.

Eleven weeks and five days after his having received the hurt, Willie Hamilton, another disabled some of the Knock cement in water, and applied it to her son's diseased foot, when, lo! the displaced bone resumed its normal position, all traces of disease vanished, and Willie Hamilton was instantaneously cured, and ever since possesses perfect health. This was on the 27th July, 1880, as a letter dry in Willie Hamilton's calendar.

Within the last week our Lady's Shrine has had three greatly pilgrim nations, the Rev. Fr. Sylvester Malone, Brooklyn, N. Y., U.S. America; Rev. Fr. Fagan, diocese of Meath, and Rev. Fr. O'Hagan, P.P., Lahinch, diocese of Dromore. A monster English pilgrimage is already being organized, and is expected soon to start.

CHEERING NEWS FOR CATHOLICS.

Interesting and Important Letter from the President of the Catholic Mutual Insurance Association.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MONITOR.

Dear Sir—Having just returned from a two weeks tour through a part of the extensive Dominion of Grass Valley, it may be in order to report progress in regard to the business which brought me thither. I went, first of all, in the interest of the Faith, and secondly, in the material interest of the Catholic people who would see things as I see them. I found in the various parishes, according to the report of the respective Pastor, the Catholic mind beyonnin, restless, and already joining dangerous associations without seemingly seeing their eyes to the dangers immediately in their way. They are getting restless, seeing themselves with large families, and if death should strike them, the providers, destitution will inevitably overtake the survivors of the family. This is which moves them to face danger to Faith, rather than leave their families in dire want. The Catholic men are going into the more secret modern organizations very fast, and these are certainly calculated to do great mischief, for, while they present a very harmless appearance, the terms obey, the fraternity, the end in view are very dangerous, and by all means to be avoided. Catholics are rushing into these societies, have the testimony of many pastors, and these same pastors having previously had it in their power only to admonish them without being able to offer any other thing to make up the deficit in the material order, everywhere hailed with delight the advent of the Catholic Mutual Beneficial Association, and lament that it was not in existence years before, as shown as I went along. Virginia City, under the efficient management of the Very Rev. Father O'Sullivan, grasped the opportunity, and the people, in response to the Pastor's call, came out in army and established a large branch of the Association. Beyond a doubt over one hundred still, inside of two months, become active members. Gold Hill, under Father Nilty, rejoices in a branch also. Carson City, under the wise and fatherly care of Father Tierney, has fair to outrival many longer established. There is at present quite a membership there, and Father Tierney is determined, in the race for Faith and even temporal benefits for his people, not to be outdone. Reno has an active one, but Truckee, more unprovoking, under the management of Mr. Sheridan, will, in all probability, give a very good number to swell the ranks of the Association. The Catholic Mutual Beneficial Association is working now in forty-two districts along the Pacific Coast and in the Province of California. The very cautious Catholics who won't join anything Catholic until they see success staring them in the face, while they if you knew, failed into anything that a few Masonic charge or ridiculous Redan, or shipful of humanity w'l about out before them wholesomely promises of temporal gain. Such Catholics, waking in the future, while we are working up the Catholic Mutual Beneficial Association, and helping on Longer, our organization in a mission too general to allow of any, or scarcely any, of our people are taking hold of it, the prolusions unless I is, and the lady who have not millions in bank only want to be sure of success before they will join in gets. To make it a success, there is no trick at all. Unite all the people of the parish Catholic and wise administration on the part of the Pastor, and success is the inevitable result. There is no reason why those two cannot be half, if not more than half, the people in the Catholic Church, the grand mark of her divine institution, and hence Catholics ought to unite in upholding that which is calculated to preserve their faith intact, and the charity, which under this faith moves, ought to excite all Catholics to better themselves, not alone for the spiritual but even the temporal welfare of the Catholic people. Better themselves with the Catholic Mutual Beneficial Association, from the beginning, and, if they will, they will come connected with it, I may now say I am identified with it, and hence take a lively interest in its welfare. I shall be happy to help it all that can. I will hold myself ready to render a helping hand to any of my brother priests in establishing this grand work in their parishes. The Directors are men not of great wealth, but of great intelligence, and, I may add, of great and true Catholic to the core; they are wholly interested in the organization without any other reward except that which St. Paul looked for after he had "kept the faith and fought the good fight."

I feel confident, Mr. Editor, that this Association will effect great good, spiritually and temporally, for our people, and, hence, I feel the expressed judgment of prelates and priests, and all the laity who know

THE GREAT ARCHDISHOP.

Dedicated to Most Rev. T. W. Croke, Archbishop of Cashel.

BY FANNY E. PARNELL.

We said, each man, within his sad and bitter hate: "Behold, we stand alone!
And they who flout us now shall gather where we strewed, and reap where we have sown.
The priest and scribe, the learned and great, they cease to lie with coldly turning eyes;
While, inch by inch, and step by step, we push the fight that yields for us no prize.
Aye! they who pented hands, once, of love for justice, liberty, and man,
We make like traitors, and spit against us now the venom of their pious lax.
All men, we groaned, "are basest in burden of prey, and only we are left
To catch the dropped threads that our sires let fall from Freedom's open and bloody weft."
Ah! sorely erred we then; for,—even as we thus, our fruitful moans and cries
Right up, in bitter unbelief, against the dumb face of the patient skies,—
Out from the bosom of the heaving South a lustre blossomed—or the land,
That broiledsing, whitening, brightening grew—a great white rose held fast in God's own hand;—
Grew over all the stormy brazen, and opened wide for all the glorious breath
Till, as the rolled Jew his Zion's fanes, so Cashel's range, from which he blessed—
Ah, High-priest of our noblest dreams! before that dreadful altar shines thy face,
Beneath which sob and rail the souls of those who died—in vain—to save their race;—
"How long, O God! how long are Thou averse our sacrifice of blood and tears?"
And from the hoarse answer murmurs back "Not yet, till all God willed be slain!"
Thy feet are drenched in scarlet wine, the sacramental flood that pours
From England's wine-press when she treads the yearly vintage of our mangled shores:
And England's thunders threat thy consecrated head, and Christian lessons pine
To hunt once more the unresisting priest, and break the sanctuaries' shrine!
Yet, brighter still for storm and night thy face shall glow, and bell the herd around,
That upon Sinai's tempest blackened peak, thy soul the light of God has found!
With Him whose holiest word is Love, thy soul has talked, and back to earth has brought,
The radiance by th' Immortals sealed upon it—how that wears a Godsglow thought.
Like Moses to the people, where, fear-stricken, told the white they doubt and quail,
Thy prophet voice peals forth again "This saith the Lord: this time thy shall not fail."
And on the heights, like Moses, too, of yore, thy hands are raised for us in night,
While through the shadows of the valleys at thy feet a hundred Joshuas lead the fight.

Lift up thy hands, and weary not, for shining arise fill the lurid skies—
Lift still thy hand, and leave us not, for victory waits at last upon thy prayer,
And 'mid the clamor and the heat, thy warning voice breathes calm and low—
"Be true, O children, and be pure; be bold, yet strike no foul's or ruffian's blow."
Thine be a loftier task than saintly Patrick wrought in splendid years long past;
When from our shores—as legends tell—the crawling snake and skulking wolf he cast.
Be thine the mission to uproot from human breasts, the bestial, false and vile,
And give to us once more, purged clean with tears and fire, our long-lost Holy Isle.

Nannette's Hero.

[WRITTEN FOR THE MONITOR].

My little niece Nannette came to me all breathless from chasing butterflies in the garden, and asked me for a story.

"What shall it be?" I said, smoothing back the tangled golden hair from the heated forehead, "will Mother Goose do?"

"Oh! no, please!" she cried; "tell me a real story; a story about some little boy or girl you have known, like Willie Seton's life, for instance."

"And who is Willie Seton, little one," I asked. The child's blue eyes opened wide in sudden wonder as she replied:

"Do you not know Willie Seton, the lame boy who lives in the red house under the maples, and works so hard to help his mother support Eddie and May and Baby Nell?"

"No, my pet, I do not know Willie, but tell me all about him;" and so Nannette, seating herself close beside me, told the story of Willie's life, aided now and then, when the busy thoughts failed her, by her mother.

"It is two years now since Mrs. Seton came from New York, to make her home in the red house known as "The Maples," just outside the village of Brookfield. The neighbors were very curious at first, and wondered, if she was not wealthy, how she would support her four children, the eldest a cripple, the youngest an infant, and she herself such a dainty, delicate-looking person. The village was already supplied with school teachers; professors of French and music taught these branches to the few families who could afford such luxuries. Three milliners, who were classed as fashionable, more fashionable, most fashionable, swung their signs on the principal street, and as for fine laundry work, every housekeeper in the place prided herself on never giving out a stitch of washing." Certainly it was a dark prospect for a woman, nurtured as she had been, to find herself thus cast upon her own resources, compelled to toil for daily bread. But love makes weak women strong, and love for her little ones urged her to cast about her for some employment which would insure food for the future. The house in which she lived was all that was left of her husband's immense fortune, but poor and lowly as it was, she was very grateful to God for its shelter, and went to work with a will to provide for the comfort of her children.

"Willie, her eldest boy, was hopelessly lame, and his face disfigured with burnt scars; but then were scars of honor his mother said, for he had received them in saving his baby sister's life when their city home was destroyed by fire, and she, having waked the other children, was hurrying them into the street, forgetting Baby Nell in her cradle, till she reached the door, when Willie cried "Oh! mamma, where's the baby!" and bounded back into the blinding smoke and flames; she would have followed, but the strong arm of neighbors held her back. Brave firemen attempted to enter the house, but were forced back by the flames which had seized on the hall and stairway, thus cutting off Willie's only means of escape; ladders were hoisted to the upper windows, but the heat was so intense none dared venture them, and they too, soon fell a prey to the fire. But the crowd constantly increasing crowd sought to devise means to effect an entrance to the burning building, they heard a childish voice calling to them; and saw Willie standing on the ledge of an upper window, holding Baby Nell in his arms; a hundred hands were at once uplifted, a hundred voices called upon him to throw them the babe and they would catch it, and leap down and save his own life. He heard the call, and carefully drawing the babe's cradle blanket closer around it, he gathered his remaining strength and flung it down to the hands as eagerly stretched to receive it; but the exertion had been too much for him, and losing his balance he fell forward, and downward, striking heavily on the projecting roof of a balcony, from which he rebounded into the arms of the waiting throng below, who bore the little hero to his mother. Insensible, blackened by fire and smoke, his right leg broken in two places by his fall, they gave him up to her, and for weeks he lay between life and death: the small sum of money saved from the wreck of her husband's fortune dwindled rapidly away, and debt came upon her, compelling her to sacrifice, for a trifling sum, the generous home which her handsome home once stood. When Willie was sufficiently recovered to bear the fatigue of removal, she came here to live, and finding all other avenues of employment closed to her, resolved to become a market gardener. The grounds at the Maples were large and well suited for the purpose, and with the aid of hired labor, cheaply obtained in quiet Brookfield, were soon in splendid order, planted with the choicest vegetables, for whose sale she contracted with city marketmen. Nor was the beautiful neglected! a small space in front of her humble dwelling was devoted to the culture of flowers, and so she worked, day after day, aided always by Willie, who developed an artistic skill in the manufacture of tiny flower baskets, for which there was an unceasing demand, till every child in the place had at least one, and such lovely bouquets as he can arrange too.

"There had been no choir in our church, and so, in a few weeks after Mrs. Seton's arrival in the village, it was arranged that she should train the best singers in the congregation who desired to use their voices in splendid vocal and instrumental powers, it was decided to give her a small salary, in return for which she sings every Sunday, and you will hear her to-morrow, dear uncle, when we go to church. And you must come with me sometimes and see her garden and my hero Willie, and Eddie, May, and Baby Nell, and—"

A summons to tea interrupted my voluble Nannette, and no more was said of Willie until the next day, when pausing for a moment on the steps of the Church to look on scenes once familiar to my eyes, my little niece drew me down to her whisper.

"Be sure to look at the May-Altar to our Lady, it was Willie designed it, and you will soon hear his mother ringing; be sure and listen, Uncle."

Holding Nan's hand, she led me up to the old family pew, where I used to kneel by my mother's side in my boyish days. For the first time in thirteen years I entered it that day. For thirteen long years I had wandered on the golden shores of California, wearing out in lonliness and exile a bitter heart-sorrow of which none of my home friends ever dreamed. During that time my father and mother had passed to their heavenly reward, my brothers had sought new homes in distant States, and only my widowed sister and her little daughter Nannette remained to welcome me home. I fear my devotions were sadly interrupted by the tide of emotional memories, which surged over my heart as I knelt there with my eyes fixed upon the May Altar, seeing, yet not seeing, the fairy-like decorations wrought by the hands of Nan's crippled hero. The statue of our Lady still wore the same heavenly smile, whose memory had been like a talisman to me during the wild wanderings of the past years, and upon it my gaze was fixed as I breathed a prayer of thanksgiving for her protection through the changing scenes of my life; the prayer my dear, dead mother had taught me to say, when she bade me give my life and love and sorrows to Jesus through Mary's hands.

Then the full, rich notes of a woman's voice, rising and blending with the solemn tones of the organ, fell upon my ear. Nan's admonition to listen was not needed; I did listen; could I help it? It was the voice of the woman whose love I had failed to win, and whose loss had made me a wanderer on the face of the earth, the voice of lovely Mary Allison, now Mary Seton.

Next day, in the company of my niece, I visited the Maples. Was I pleased? Judge for yourself. That was eleven years ago. Mrs. Seton has been Mrs. Underhill almost as many years.

Willie, now a rising young artist, is Nannette's hero still. Last May, when bird and garden were at their fairest, Nan and Willie recorded their marital vows in the old church at Brookfield. They are now in Rome, that glorious centre of religion and art, he studying with heart and soul, and my little Nan cheering and aiding him with hopeful words and loving counsels, and so the story the child commenced that bright May evening long ago, finds its sequel in the peace and happiness of our lives. CURIOUS ANTIPATHIES.

Singular Peculiarities of Celebrated People.

It is well known that the vanity of King James I. never overcame his weakness of being unable to look on a naked sword. Sir Kenelm Digby was proud to relate that when he was knighted at Hinchinbrooke, near Huntingdon, the king turned his face away and nearly wounded him. This may be accounted for, as his mother, Mary Queen of Scots, a short time before his birth, had a great shock given to her on seeing her favorite, David Rizzio, killed in her presence. We are told of Ladislaus, king of Poland, that he could not bear to see apples. Peiranc, the eminent traveler, had a great aversion to wigs, which was also transferred to their wearers for the time. Once, in the presence of the Mayor of Chester, who wore a powdered wig, he grew excited and nervous, and angrily made some strong remarks about the mayor to a companion. At last, losing all control over his feelings he rushed at the mayor, pulled off his wig and ran with it out of the house and down the street, using it aloft as the sweep. The mayor followed, to the amusement of the populace; and this curious race was afterward known as the "Mayor and Mr. Peiranc's Tour Through Chester."

It is said of the Duke of Schomberg that, soldier as he was, he could not sit in the same room with a cat, and we have heard of a peculiar dislike to a great antipathy to cats, which, however, we do not mention

Protestant Opinions of the Jesuits.

One of the favorite arguments used by the enemies of the Sons of Loyola in order to prejudice unreflecting and shallow-minded people against them, and also against the Catholic Church, is the fact that the Jesuits were expelled from many lands, hence, they must have been "dangerous" to the communities from which they were thus banished. This being the view taken of the question by Pixley in a recent article, we deem it opportune to show up the fallacy of fanatical Frank, and at the same time lay before our readers a few extracts from the writings of Protestant authors—men whose minds were not imbued with the malignant and mendacious spirit which animates the scribe who assails a Religious Society simply because it pays to pander to the prejudices of a portion of the community who hate the Jesuits—just as our Divine Redeemer predicted the world would hate His disciples—because they are known as the SOCIETY OF JESUS.

The fallacy of condemning the Jesuits as "dangerous" to civil society, because they have been expelled from other lands, will at once become apparent to any reasoning, intelligent and impartial reader when he reflects upon the fact that the Son of God Himself was compelled to fly from the dominions of an earthly monarch in order to save His life. What was the flight into Egypt only a veritable expulsion of the Holy Family; and must we argue therefrom that the Son of God was "dangerous" to civil society because Herod issued his mandate to kill all the male children who had reached the age of two years, that were in Jerusalem! On the same principle, this massacre of the Holy Innocents might be cited by the enemies of Christianity in order to prove the religion of Christ inimical to civil society, as to say that the Jesuits are "dangerous" because bad monarchs and plotting politicians have caused their expulsion from many lands.

In the first centuries of the Church the Christians were driven into the Catacombs; they were condemned by civil law and exiled from society, because they refused to worship the idols of the State; but, assuredly, no man of ordinary intelligence will argue therefrom that Christianity must be condemned in consequence of the persecuting influence of pagan governments. Again, the Vicar of Christ has been ruthlessly torn from the Chair of Peter by the arm of the civil power and compelled to live in exile by the strength of standing armies; but we must not conclude therefrom that the Pope nasty invasion is an contrary to reason; he is the lot of the Church, and her religious communities must not expect to be exempt from the ordeal prefigured and personified in the earthly life of our Blessed Redeemer, who has foretold that they who suffered persecution for His sake shall be eternally rewarded in Heaven.

From these irrefutable historical evidences it is easy to conceive that the Jesuits were expelled—not because they were "dangerous" to the civil power, but because they had preached and practiced the faith of Christ among courts and communities which sought to place the laws of Cesar above the laws of God. Had the Jesuits allowed themselves to become the plaint tools of corrupt diplomats, or the willing minions of weak monarchs, they could have purchased immunity from expulsion by their hypocrisy; but they sought not to placate the passions of either monarchs or multitudes by any divergence from the straight line, of divine truth; hence, they had to be led forth as malefactors, just as the Son of God was led before Pilate and Herod—to be the innocent victim of the malice of the multitude.

It is the crowning glory of the Jesuits that no charge ever brought against them by their worst enemies has been proved. The Society of Jesus stands before the world to-day as immaculate from crime as it was when this system of sanctified life first emanated from the mind of its founder in the cave of Manresa, and the calumnies which are cast at its members by vile and disreputable traducers will only serve to add lustre to a concrete body of Christian soldiers who have borne the brunt of the assaults of atheism upon every battlefield.

The Jesuits care nothing for the opinions of men. Like their canonized founder, they have learned that to serve God they must cast aside the opinions of the world and work only for His honor and glory. But in order that our readers may have a knowledge of the high esteem in which the Jesuits were held by men whose opinions were not in the slightest degree biased in their favor, we append a few extracts from the writings of learned men of Protestant proclivities:

Macaulay the historian, alluding to the self-abnegation of the members of this great Order, says: "They made converts in regions where neither avarice nor curiosity had tempted any of their countrymen to enter, and preached in tongues of which no labor native of the West understood a word." Grotius, a Calvinist, pays them this glowing tribute: "Great is the influence of the Order with the public, both on account of its holiness, and because, without receiving pay, they instruct youth in the principles of learning and wisdom. Their members have learned to cast off the fear of death and bid farewell to all human affections."

The Scotch historian Robertson, alluding to the missionary triumphs of the Jesuits in the New World, says "The Jesuits alone made humanity the object of their zeal and care. . . . The Jesuits set themselves to instruct and to civilize the savages . . . These people became the subjects of their benefactors, who had governed them with a tender attention, resembling that which a father directs to his children. Respected and beloved almost to adoration, a few descendants presided over some hundred thousand Indians."

Montesquieu, who was an infidel, could not refrain from paying a just meed of praise to a body of men who have done so much to improve mankind and to elevate Christianity in every land. Alluding to the wonderful work which the Society accomplished in Paraguay, he says: "Their exquisite sense of what they consider honor, their zeal for Christianity, has made them undertake great things, and they have succeeded."

Our own historian Bancroft, in his history of the United States, pays a glowing tribute to the pioneer missionary labors of the Jesuits, when he admits that "not a cape was turned nor a river entered but a Jesuit led the way."

Sismondi, Chateaubriand, Montalgne, and even Voltaire, each contributed his chaplet of commendation in order to adorn the statue of gratitude which has been erected in the hearts of all true Christians in memory of the undying zeal of the Sons of Loyola; and, in the language of a Church of England clergyman, the well-wishers of Christianity in every land will impart this benison upon the head of every member of the Society of Jesus—"Wherever they go God's blessing follows with them; the blessings of the poor who were fed daily at their gates; of the prisoners whom they visited; of the young whom they instructed for this world, and guided to happiness in the next; of all that vast multitude which has heard Jerusalem! On the same principle, this massacre of the Holy Innocents might be cited by the enemies of Christianity in order to prove the religion of Christ inimical to civil society, as to say that the Jesuits are "dangerous" because bad monarchs and plotting politicians have caused their expulsion from many lands.

In the first centuries of the Church the Christians were driven into the Catacombs; they were condemned by civil law and exiled from society, because they refused to worship the idols of the State; but, assuredly, no man of ordinary intelligence will argue therefrom that Christianity must be condemned in consequence of the persecuting influence of pagan governments. Leo XIII. on the Insult to the Ashes of Pius IX.

We omit a large portion of editorial matter this week in order to lay before our readers the following translation of the Allocution delivered by the Sovereign Pontiff recently before the College of Cardinals upon an outrageous event which has caused more excitement throughout the Christian world than any incident that has occurred in the history of the Church during the present century. The impassioned language of the Holy Father shows how deeply he feels the insult which was sought to be cast upon the whole Catholic Church by the ruffianly mob which King Humbert permitted to assail the ashes of one of the most illustrious Pontiffs that ever occupied the Chair of Peter, and we sincerely hope this feeling of righteous indignation is shared in by every reader of the MONITOR. In the Allocution alluded to the Holy Father says:

We have hastened, venerable brethren, to call your august College before Us, in order that the provision We have to make for several affairs may afford Us the opportune occasion for opening Our mind and communicating to you the grief We have recently suffered because of the execrable and disastrous events which happened in Italy during the removal of the remains of our predecessor, Pius IX., of happy memory. We exposed upon Our beloved Son, the Cardinal Secretary of State, that he should without delay report the unexpected and unworthy outrage to the Sovereigns of Europe: nevertheless, the insult cast upon that great predecessor and the outraged majesty of the Pontiff could not worthily expiate unless We raise Our voice to-day, in order that the sentiments of Our heart may receive public evidence. We feel, We hear, and that the Catholic nations may understand that We have done all in Our power to guard the memory of a most holy personage and to

DEFEND THE MAJESTY OF THE SUPREME PONTIFF AT

As you know, venerable brethren, Pius IX. ordered that his body should be buried in the Basilica of San Lorenzo Fuori le Mura. Wherefore, having to carry his last will into effect, it was, in intelligence with those whose duty it is to guarantee the public security, established that the removal from the Vatican Basilica should be made in the silence of the night and during the hours which are usually the most quiet. Similarly, it was decided that the translation should be made in the manner prescribed by the present condition of Rome, instead of in the splendid form proper to the Pontifical majesty and the traditional usages of the Church. But the news was suddenly spread throughout the city that the Roman people, mindful of the virtues and the benefits conferred by the great Pontiff, had spontaneously manifested the desire of rendering to their common father and filial affection. That manifestation of gratitude and affection was intended to be accompanied by the gravity and the religious sentiments of the Roman people, who had no other intention than that of associating themselves decorously in the cortège and assisting numerously and reverently at its passing. On the day and at the hour fixed for the transfer, the sacred remains were taken from the Vatican Temple, while a great multitude of citizens, Many were around the funeral car; very many bedewed it with their tears, so sorrowing. Intent on reciting the fitting prayers, they piously uttered a cry or murmured an act which could provoke any order or give cause in any way for disturbance. But, behold! from the very beginning of the religious accompaniment

THE LAST TRIBUTE OF RESPECT

A HANDFUL OF WORK-MEN BANDS disturbed the and ceremony with reckless clamors. Gradually increasing in audacious boldness, they redoubled the clamors and tumult; they insulted the sacred things; assailed such losses and continually the highest respectability, and, with a threatening and contemptuous aspect, they surrounded the funeral cortège. Leading them, and throwing stones at them, Moreover, what even barbarians would not have dared they dared, not respecting even the remains of the Holy Pontiff, for, not only did they imprecate the name of Pius IX., but they which carried the corpse, and more than once was the cry raised to throw away the coffin unburied. Throughout all the long way, and for the space of two hours, the indecent spectacle lasted, and if they did not succeed greater excesses, the merit is due to the long suffering of those who, although provoked by every violence and insult, contained themselves, keeping themselves to the insults rather than permit, they pious office to be saddened by more mournful scenes. Fresh cry side from the execration of such a disgrace and enormous outrage poured reach us daily. But, above all, the deepest grief and pain cannot fill

THE ATROCIOUS CRIME RENTS THIS OUR SOUL,

and insuscath as our duty constitutes Us the vindicator of all that is attempted to the detriment of the majesty of the Roman Pontificate and of the venerated memory of our predecessor. We solemnly protest before you, venerable brethren, against the deplorable excesses, and We loudly denounce the insults, the entire blame for which falls upon those who did not defend either the rights of religion nor the liberty of the citizens from the fury of the impious. And from this also the Catholic world may judge what security there is left for Us in Rome. It was already well and openly known that We are reduced to a most difficult, and for many reasons intolerable, condition, but the recent facts of which We have spoken have made this more clearly manifest, and together they have demonstrated that if the present state of things is bitter to Us

STILL MORE BITTER IS THE FEAR OF THE FUTURE.

If the removal of the ashes of Pius IX. gave cause for such unworthy disturbances and such serious insults, who could give warranty that the audacity of the wicked would not break out into the same excesses when they saw Us pass along the streets of Rome in a manner becoming Our dignity? And especially if they believed they had just motive, because We thereselves, through duty, went to condemn unjust laws decreed in Rome, or to reprove the wickedness of any other public act. Hence it is more than ever evident that in the present circumstances We cannot remain in Rome otherwise than as a prisoner in the Vatican. Moreover, whoever pays attention to certain indications which here and there manifest themselves, and considers, at the same time, that the sects have openly conspired for

THE EXTERMINATION OF THE NAME OF CATHOLIC,

has reason to affirm that more pernicious intentions are being matured to the injury of the religion of Christ, of the Supreme Pontiff, and of the Sovereignty of the Roman people. We certainly, as is Our duty, follow with attentive watch the course and movement of the human struggle, and at the same time, prepare the most opportune means of defence. Repeating all Our hopes in God, We are resolved to combat to the very last for the safety of the Church, for the independence of the Supreme Pontiff, for the rights and the majesty of the Apostolic See, and in such a combat we are resolved to spare no labor and to fear no difficulty. Nor shall We combat alone, inasmuch as in your virtue and constancy, my venerable brethren, We, in every respect, place the greatest trust. No small comfort and support to Us, also, is the goodwill and the piety of the Romans, who, tempted in a thousand ways and by every art, remain with singular firmness obedient to the Church and faithful to the Pontiff. Nor do they neglect any occasion to show how deeply those virtues are inscribed in their hearts

Bismarck's New Role.

Prince Bismarck and the Prussian Government, says the Study of Times, are giving proofs of a determined wish to bring the wretched conflict to an end which they forced on the Catholic Church eight years ago. The outward relief act last year has afforded no relief of any kind, and they are now try to begin at the right end by filling those bishops seats again which have been "observacant" for some years. Eight out of the vacancies of Prussia are in this condition. In two of them, namely, in Paderborn and Paderborn, capitular vicars have been instituted by way of a makeshift, the Government has now declared to the Chapter of Treves that they will not grant to the election of Dr Kerum, of Strasburg, who has been designated as Bishop by that Chapter. Now, Dr. Kerum is a German and making a German Bishop of him looks like offering an olive branch to the sulking people of Alsace. An excellent choice Prince Bismarck's, to be sure, but would it be judged that the liberal party in Germany are fighting tooth and nail against the carrying out of this project, because, forsooth, Dr. Kerum was originally a student of the Jesuit College of Innsbruck. It is only to be hoped that Prince Bismarck will show sense enough to allow himself to be thwarted by a set of fanatics whom Germany has expelled out of what little they have in the shape of wits.

Ruin of British Crops.

A cablegram under late of the 26th ult., says it is still raining or threatening rain, and the harvest outlook grows more and more gloomy. Farmers are depending this year more upon the extra quantity of grain than upon an increased abundance and that crop is now being knocked from under them. Last night in London was as raw and wet as in October, and in the outlying districts it is feared it will be worse. Reports from Lincolnshire and the fine fields of the East Riding of Yorkshire report grain stacked in fields in, in many places, quite deeply in water. Throughout the southeastern counties out grain is turning black or sprouting, and standing wheat is being threshed out. The prospect for root crops in some districts in Ireland are promising under water, and the potato crop, which promises to be a very abundant one, is said to be seriously damaged by rot. The farmers everywhere are disheartened. In from seven years since there was a really good harvest, and this year they had counted upon some profit, to extricate themselves from mortgages and back rents, which are crushing them.

A Question Well Answered.

The Anglo-Catholic, a ritualistic Protestant paper of New York, makes this lamentation over its lost sheep:

"We have never yet been in a diocese where many Churchmen have left the Church. Within a stone throw of our office there are hundreds of Catholics who come to better do not members of the Church of England. Why do they go elsewhere?"

To which a contemporary says that these converts left the erratic Episcopalian sect for the same reason that Newman, Faber, Manning, Wilberforce, and a host of others left the pride of the Church of England, went elsewhere. For the same reason that your Bishop Pro, Hunington, Doane, Preston, Kent Stone, and countless other Proteus ant Episcopal stars in the United States went out from you. They went elsewhere—to the Catholic and Apostolic Church—because they wanted the substance, not the shadow—the grain, not the chaff.

The Church in Prussia.

How heartrending the spiritual destitution has become among the Catholic people of Prussia is shown most clearly by a statistical account that was circulated lately among the members of the Prussian Parliament. The following brief abstract of this paper shows it clearly enough. Number of Catholics in Prussia, 8,711,555. Parishes and curacies in 1873, 8,429, vacancies in 1880, 1,777; parishes entirely bereaved, 601; parishes partially bereaved, 584; total of bereaved parishes, 1,185. Now, the 601 "entirely bereaved" parishes have a Catholic population of 646,697 people, and the "partially bereaved" parishes are inhabited by 1,501,743 Catholics; so that on January 1st, 1881, there were 2,148,691 Catholics in Prussia, who are left to live and die without any regular arrangements for their spiritual requirements being provided for. And yet, should be allowed to celebrate Mass for the living and administer the Sacraments to the dying, the Prussian Government and Parliament imperatively

THE REPUBLICAN CANDIDATE FOR SHERIFF.

SAN FRANCISCO, Aug. 31, 1881.

To the EDITOR OF THE MONITOR.

Dear Sir: It affended me a great degree of pleasure to read in your paper a short time since that Mr. Mooney has no interest in politics; that is, he is not what parts a Catholic has to find with so long as he possessed the Indispensable requisites of honesty, capacity and efficiency. It is for this reason, therefore, that we, as Catholics and a constant reader of the MONITOR, I could not present in your columns the name of one of our fellow-citizens, who, although a Republican—is well worthy the suffrages of all his papers of San Francisco, not only as a Catholic but as a Christian, and, in the special capacity for the office to which he aspires, but also for the reason that he is neither a blot in religion nor a Crescent in his political opinions. He is in all matters of opinion a man who is above party prejudice; a man who is fully imbued with the doctrine that all citizens being equal before the law, so they all should be eligible to political injustice; hence, he has no sympathy whatever with that low-minded spirit which occasionally manifests itself through the proscriptive tendency of the Republican as well as in the Democratic party.

The gentleman to whom I allude is JOHN SULLIVAN, who, for thirty years, has been a citizen of this State, and through his whole industrial and political career, has shown that he is not the wretched conflict—an end which they forced on the Catholic Church eight years ago. The outward relief act last year has afforded no relief of any kind, and they are now try to begin at the right end by filling those bishops seats again which have been "observacant" for some years. COLLECTOR APPOINTED FOR THE CONTEMPLATED NEW CATHEDRAL.

SAN FRANCISCO, August 26, 1881.

REV. DEAR SIR: I hereby appoint you to the laborious and yet meritorious office of collecting what has been and what may be subscribed for the "New St. Mary's Cathedral." Some efforts have been made to secure a suitable site for the contemplated edifice in a central and respectable part of the city; but the collections have been slender in so lovely that it is deemed necessary to dedicate a period exclusively devoted to that particular charge. Therefore, please accept this office for the love of God and for the love of religion; and for the same holy objects please use the subscribers to do all in their power to pay their subscriptions, in whole or in part, as may be to their ability. Yours truly in Christ,

✠ J. S. ALEMANY,
Archbishop of San Francisco.

REV. JOHN MCCARTY, Secretary.

CHURCH DEDICATION ON SUNDAY NEXT.

On next Sunday Archbishop Alemany will dedicate the new church of the Holy Cross at Kenny at the Potrero. The ceremonies will begin at 10 o'clock A.M., and, after the dedication, High Mass will be celebrated by the Rev. Prendergast, V.G., will preach on the occasion. The church will be dedicated to St. Teresa, and being, I believe, the only church in the city it will doubtless be productive of much spiritual good. After Mass Archbishop Alemany will administer the Sacrament of Confirmation.

CONFIRMATION IN THE CATHEDRAL OF GRACE VALLEY BY RIGHT REV. BISHOP MANOGUE.

Seldom has the old patriotic Irish district of St. Patrick encircled within its venerable walls such an assembly as on Sunday August 28th, feast of St. Augustine, Irish Catholics and Protestants commingled in witnessing the imposing ceremonies of the day. The weather was more than charming; the Sabbath day's rest relentantly departing Summer would seem to have prolonged their sojourn of rich and delicate hues only to grace and legantly the solemn assembly. But the beauty of the flowers was eclipsed and cast in the shade by the loveliness of the children. Formerly they were seen and pointed to her boys as her jewels. How much more naturally and reasonably might not, on Sunday last, the proud mother point to her girls as have pointed to their meek and lovely children as their priceless and precious jewels. The lofty loud peals would seem to be more angelic than usual on that bright and cheerful morning. At an early hour could have been seen, rolling, with diligence, in all directions, down the streets, lanes, avenues and alleys, bright and cheerful as new robes and blue sashes, would remind one of celestial tales of fairy spangles, while their simplicity, innocence, and modesty, in contrast with opulence could not help leading the sinner to reflection and repentance, and the angels in heaven were smiling upon the cheerful subjects of Grace Valley, and that angels were permitted to mingle their prayers with those of the children of men. Of the boys a somewhat similar description, did time permit, would not be out of place. They, too, looked as if they were equally remarkable and edifying.

Now where was the centre of attraction on that occasion? Was it in the cheerful and serene countenances of all that life and animation, all that bright and cheerful, and beautiful, and loveliness united Summer flowers and Sabbath truths? It was the Bishop and for especial meaning, for it was the first time he has been in this city since his consecration, and from several years and a half of long and hard exertion in behalf of the Church, he has been absent from the place of his episcopal residence. The Bishop's appearance in the pulpit was not generally participated in by other churches, and no wonder work can have the end of the ceremonies of Confirmation that with tribe to protect the youth of the State, to shall have been, they are unprotected, and to make their instructions and model members of society the ceremonies with which this result is achieved in this Diocese, it is sufficient to state that from April to July last positions were so rapidly filled up that there were hundreds of persons in positions where they are able to support themselves and have left room for the ranks of the Southern brigade through disease or fatigue, and the ranks of the Northern brigade through death, the ranks of the Southern brigade have been fed, clothed, and provided with a home, and there are many more remain at the Institution, and in the altars and Sanctuary. But show of honor and brilliancy and loveliness must have appeared to the Bishop and people, and the joy, gallery and body of the Church. Right Rev. Bishop Manogue celebrated Mass, after which he delivered an eloquent and pathetic discourse on the text which is the text of the Institution, the text which is the text of charity and—the text which is the text of the Institution, the text which is the text of charity and—the text which is the text of the Institution, the text which is the text of charity and—

Farm and Home.

Cash vs. Credit.

There are some maxims in business which a man, and especially a farmer, who is generally defective in this respect should write on the first page of his memorandum book or diary, and read over every day. Some of these are—"Owe no small debts." "It is better to borrow money on a note or a mortgage, and pay a moderate interest on it, than to have a number of small debts out." "Buy for cash." "Sell for cash." "Do not buy anything that you do not want." "Do not want a thing because it is cheap." "Avoid auction sales." "Never endorse a note." "If you wish to oblige a friend and have the money loan it to him; but put your name on no man's paper." "An indorsed note comes due always at an inconvenient time." "Never count your money until it is in your pocket." Many others might be added, but here are enough. If you want good authority for these, we may refer you to Solomon first, in whose ancient writings all these, and many more of similar import, may be found.

Wash for Fruit Trees.

A correspondent of the Rural Messenger has had good results from the application of lime, wood ashes and old iron put around the roots of fruit trees that were not doing well, thus restoring the trees to a healthy condition and improving the quality of the fruit. As a wash for mossy trees he gives the following: Heat an ounce of ash soda to redness in an iron pot and dissolve it in one gallon of water, and while warm apply it to the trunk. After one application the moss and old bark will drop off and the trunk will be quite smooth.

Food for Infants.

The French Commissioners on the Hygiene of Infancy, in awarding the prize in a competition of essayists, report that the conclusions generally arrived at lead to the following recommendations: No child should be reared artificial food when the mother can suckle it, but such food is preferable to placing the child with a wet nurse, poorly remunerated, and living in her own home. For successfully bringing up an infant by hand, the best milk is that of a cow that has recently calved, or similar; of a goat, to which should be added during the first week a half part of water, and subsequently a fourth or less, according to the digestive powers of the child. Glass or earthenware also should be used; no vulcanized India-rubber mouthpiece or vessel containing lead ought to be employed.

Family Fun.

What He Hadn't.

A certain rich man possessed of great wealth was wont to be proud of his possession and to refer to them often, but, withal, he was not a man of intellect. One day he had an old Irishman working for him, and he went out to oversee the job. He looked at Pat a minute, hard at work, and said:

"Well, Pat, if's good to be rich, ain't it?"

"Yis, sir," said Pat, who had the wit of his nation.

"I am rich, very rich, Pat."

"Yis, sir."

"I own lands, and houses, and bonds."

"Yis, sir," said Pat, shoveling away.

"And what is it Pat, that I have? eh?"

"Not a bit of sinse, sir," remarked Pat, as he picked up his wheel-barrow and trundled it off full of dirt; and the rich man went into the house and sat down behind the door.

What Blanched a Young Man's Hair.

A parson who has not had a long experience in wrestling with the stalwart sin of the Comstock, was enjoying the pleasure of being shaved on Saturday afternoon. The good man perceived that the barber, though a young man, was quite gray. He inquired the artist's age.

"Twenty-seven," answered the barber.

"Dear me, and yet your hair is almost white."

The barber sighed and admitted that it was even so.

"And what," asked the kindly preacher, "was the cause of it?"

"Grief."

"Dear me, dear me, this is sad. And might I inquire the nature of your great grief?"

"Certainly. Tried to beat three aces with three kings."

A dim, religious silence, and a customer lost.

An Exacting Tramp.

Yesterday a tramp was tried in Judge Cary's Court on a charge of vagrancy. He seemed to take no special interest in the case until a policeman took the stand and was sworn.

"Have you got a little about the place?" he asked of the Court; "when a policeman swears in a case of mine I want his to kiss the book. I want his testimony pledged with solemnity."

A Bible was brought, and the policeman took the oath, at which the tramp said that he guessed the jury might as well be seven the same way. His wishes were complied with, as Judge Cary never thinks of refusing the defense a fair show. The man was found guilty, and when about to be sentenced he rose to his feet and asked that the case might be dismissed on the ground that the Court had not used the new version.

"I'm going to jail I propose to go by the law and gospel straight and clean cut. No Court can ring in rejected scriptures on me. I'm a stickler for forms and ceremonies, and things must go by the card when I'm on deck."

"If you'll just be seated I'll go through the ceremony of sending you up for thirty days. You have such a hankering for new things, I suppose you'll want a fresh Court-house built."

—"Are you any relation to my sister?" He blushed and stammered, until the young lady, taking pity on him, solved the matter by saying, "No; but he'd like to be, wouldn't you, Alfred?" Cards will soon be out.

—"Your horse has some unmistakable points," said a man to an equestrian mounted on a very lean animal. "Yes," was the reply; "he seems made of them.

—Straw berry shortcake is so called because it is short of strawberries.

Our Young Folks.

Little Things.

Five little loaves of barley bread
Brought by a little lad;
By these five thousand men were fed
The people all were glad.

And with the bread two little fishes
Were also brought along,
And thus were satisfied the wishes
Of all that hungry throng.

A farthing's a little thing,
Two tiny mites, no more;
And when a widow these did bring,
She gave up all her store.

The Master's commendation they
Are words that ring to day!
Dwell for ever the wealthy men,
Who gave more than they.

The seeds of many plants are small
In every garden found,
But mustard seed is least of all
That's cast into the ground.

And still we all can plainly see
If life be aught like that,
It proves to be a stately tree
Where form is such a shade.

A sparrow is a little bird,
Of plumage bright and fair,
Yet who has not the saying heard,
That God for it doth care?

A little ant is very small,
How small to human eyes!
But God on man doth earnest call
To take her and be wise.

A little cloud was seen to rise,
No larger than your hand;
But soon it covered all the skies
And darkened all the land.

A little word in kindness spoken
To one oppressed with grief,
Will prove, should it never that word be broken,
A sweet and blest relief.

A Dying Mother's Love.

The plague broke out in a little Italian village. In vain those the children were taken first: the parents watched over them, but only caught the disease which they themselves could not cure. The whole family died. On the opposite side of the way lived the family of a laborer, who was absent for the whole week only coming home Saturday night to bring his scanty earnings. His wife felt herself attacked by the fever in the night; in the morning she was worse, and before night the plague spot showed itself. She thought of the terrible fate of her neighbors. She knew she must die, but as she locked upon her dear little boys she resolved not to communicate death to them. She had before locked the children in the room and snatched her bed-clothes, lest they should keep the contagion, and left the house. She even denied herself the pleasure of a last embrace. O, think of the heroism that enabled her to conquer her feeling and all she loved, to die! Her eldest child saw her from the window. "Good bye, mother," said he, with his tenderest tone, for he wondered why his mother had left him so strangely. "Good bye, mother," repeated the youngest child, stretching his little hand out of the window. The mother paused, her heart was drawn towards her children, and she was on the point of turning back; she struggled hard while the tears rolled down her cheeks at the sight of her helpless babes; at length she turned from them. The children continued to cry "Good-bye mother. The sounds sent a thrill of anguish to her heart, but she pressed on to those who were standing her husband and children to their care with her last breath.

Trained Shepherd Dogs.

"When riding it is a common thing to meet a large flock of sheep guarded by one or two dogs, at a distance of some miles of from any house or man. I often wondered how so firm a friendship had been established. The method of education consists in separating the puppy while very young from its mother and in accustoming it to its future companions. A ewe is held two or three times a day for the little thing to suck, and a nest of wool is made for it in the sheep-pen. At no time is it allowed to associate with other dogs, or with the children of the family. From this education it learns that it is to be the flock; and just as another dog will defend its master, man, so will these dogs, defend the sheep. It is amusing to observe, when approaching a flock, how the dog immediately advances barking; and the sheep all close in his rear, as if round the oldest ram. These dogs are also easily taught to bring home the flock at a certain hour in the evening. Their most troublesome fault when young is their desire to play with the sheep, for in their sport they sometimes gallop the poor things most unmercifully.

"The shephard dog comes to the house every day for some meat, and as soon as it is given him skulks away as if ashamed of himself. On these occasions the house dogs are very tyrannical, and the least of them will attack and pursue the stranger. The intruder, however, the latter has reached the flock, he turns round and begins to bark, and then all the house dogs take quickly to their heels. In a similar manner a whole pack of hungry wild dogs will scarcely ever venture to attack a flock guarded by one of these Faithful shepherds. In this case the shepherd dog seems to regard the sheep as its fellow brethren, and thus gains confidence; and the wild dogs, though knowing that the sheep are not dogs, look on good to let, yet when seeing them in a flock with a shepherd dog at their head, partly consent to regard them as he does.

Familiar Words.

The Boston Traveler[sic] is studying philology, and explains the origin of several familiar words, thus.

Parson—In the past as in the present the village preacher's duty was to pass on from house to house of his flock, administering religious consolation. From "pass on" to "parson" the translation was easy and natural.

Army—In the days when the press gang roamed about the country, seizing upon the young men, the girls would cry out, "Oh they saw their livers borne away, "Ah, me!" In this heart-cry the "army" had its rise.

Physician—Unlike the medical fraternity of the present day, the doctors of the middle ages were unnecessarily prompt in demanding their fees. The phrase "fee-sician I on" was finally corrupted into "physician."

Officer—"Oh, fie, sir" exclaimed the rustic maidens when the epauletted heroes chucked them under the chin. This expression was afterwards changed into "officer."

TRUSTWORTHY TESTIMONY.

Some Vital Facts Concerning the Welfare of the Community Made Public.

What Californians Say, had How Their Statements are Confirmed.

(Chronicle.)

No fact has been made more plainly manifest during the past few years than the important effect which climatic changes have upon the constitutions of American people. The steady assimilation of Europe tend to longer lives, but the influence of European climate intensifies asphyxia and other similar diseases. On the other hand, the healthy habits of the American people necessarily tax the nerve centers and other important portions of the body, while severe and sudden changes of the atmosphere add still more to the difficulties to be overcome.

San Francisco, as well as all cities in this and more southern latitudes, is especially subject to these difficulties, and the necessity for the most care, particularly at this season of the year, is clearly manifest to every one who stops to reflect. These facts are especially true with reference to the human kidneys and liver, and the alarming increase of Bright's disease and all minor Kidney difficulties has caused this subject to be a theme of almost universal conversation. Knowing these facts, and in order that our readers might be more thoroughly informed upon the subject, a representative of this paper has taken pains to collect some new and important data, which is herewith presented. Having learned of a remarkable illustration of the subject under consideration, a call was made upon Mrs. N. H. D. Mason at 37 Liberty street, who, upon being questioned, said:

"For a long time my daughter had suffered with Albumenuria, and she was treated by the best physicians in this city and in its vicinity, but they failed to afford her any relief. Then symptoms of the lower extremities set in, we were in despair, and considered her disease incurable; in fact we felt that her case was utterly hopeless. Finally, that a change of climate might in some degree alleviate her sufferings, and as a last but lingering effort that I could make in her behalf, I started with her for Southern California. While on the steamer we met with a Dr. Shoverman of New York, who earnestly recommended the use of Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure for my daughter's disease, and told of several remarkable cures that had come under his observation in the East from its use. Although strongly urged to the use of proprietary medicines, and having but little faith in their efficacy, I was persuaded by the Doctor's faith in this remedy to at least give it a trial. She commenced to improve after taking the first three bottles, and from that time her improvement was rapid, until we now consider her cured. Her general health has now established, and I feel that too much cannot be said in favor of this remarkable remedy which has done so much for her.

At this point of the interview a young lady of bright and animated appearance entered the room and addressed a few words to Mrs. Mason. After her departure Mrs. Mason said:

"That was my daughter, who was once an invalid; does she look very sick now?"

The reporter expressed his surprise that a person once so hopelessly ill could ever present such a fresh and healthy appearance, but was assured that such was the case.

"Do you feel, Mrs. Mason, that you owe her recovery entirely to the use of this remedy?"

"I do most assuredly—I do not think she could have lived six months had it not been and so great is my faith in it that I unhesitatingly recommend it to all who are in any degree suffering from kidney or liver complaint."

A call was then made on Mr. C. A. Howland, No. 130 Leavenworth street.

"I believe that Mr. Face, that you have had some experience regarding the effects of our celebrated Kidney and Liver Cure. Can you give any information on the subject?" "Yes, sir; I have suffered severely from an affection of the kidneys and bladder, and I have no hesitation in stating the facts. As the world grows wiser people learn that they have kidneys and that they must take care of them. This climate renders so liable to constant colds, and a cold will settle after the kidneys if they are not at all weak. Three years ago I was taken sick with pains in my back, loins and kidneys. The doctors pronounced it Sciatica and treated me for it, but I felt sure that it was kidney and bladder difficulty. Two years ago I was in the French Hospital in this city and had the operation of Lithotripsy performed, gravel and fungus being taken from me at that time. I have consulted with the best physicians and visited all the mineral springs, but nothing gave me any permanent relief. I suffered continued pains; I have spent over $1,000 in doctor's fees and traveling expenses, but all the time the disease seemed to be making progress and getting a stronger hold on me. My weight was reduced from 185 to 128 pounds. I found, knowing my condition, advised me to try Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure. I began to get relief, if nothing more, I resolved to try it. Two days after commencing it I experienced decided relief and continued to grow better from that time.

"Then you think you owe your present health to this cure?"

"Yes, sir. It has done more for me than all the doctors or prescriptions combined. I consider it the greatest medicine of the age for Kidney and Bladder difficulty."

The next person visited was Mr. Charles E. Morgan, No. 1211 Broadway, who said: "For six years my wife has been troubled with derangement of the kidneys. She was all the time steadily growing worse, and at times was completely prostrated. Her limbs had become stiff, and the desire for natural relief was for days at a time minutes. For the last ten months her sufferings have been beyond description, and she has often prayed to die. I have employed two different physicians during this time, some of them the most prominent in this city, but they could give her no help. One day I found a pamphlet of Warner's Safe Remedies in my front yard, and took it into my wife. She had formerly lived in Albany, N. Y., and recognized some of the names attached to the testimonials in it. She thought she would like to try the medicine, and so I got her a bottle of Safe Kidney and Liver Cure, and also a bottle of Safe Nervine. It took three days of Nervine the first night to put her to sleep, the next night only one. The Safe Kidney and Liver Cure has relieved her so much that she can sleep all night without taking anything. She has taken three bottles of Kidney and Liver Cure, and now feels perfectly well, although she will continue to use it for some time to completely eradicate the disease from her system. I feel that the results of such a wonderful cure should be known to the thousands throughout the land that are suffering from Kidney and Liver Complaint, and my one suffering from such complaint, or wishing to know more of the results of this remedy, is at liberty to call upon me, or address me on the subject, and I will cheerfully tell them all I know for my wife.

No. 4 L. Knapp of Santa Clara said: "I was taken sick with catarrhal or acute inflammation of the bladder. My sufferings were intense and I was often obliged to get up from ten to fifteen times during the night, when my urine would be so great that I was almost bent double. I employed the best medical aid, both homœopathic and allopathic, but was pronounced by all incurable. They said I could not live long, and I thought myself that my time on earth was drawing to a close and gave up all hopes of recovery. My son in St. Louis, knowing how sick I was, sent me some papers containing reports from several of the St. Louis leading physicians and testimonials from a number of citizens concerning the cures resulting from the use of Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure and urged me to try it. I took some of the medicine and immediately commenced its use. After taking a few bottles I found myself rapidly improving until I can now say I am cured.

"What do your physicians say about your recovery?"

"Only a short time ago I met Dr. Carpenter and said to him, 'What do you think of the effect of Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure?' He answered, 'I think that medicine one of a thousand the only it has acted in your case.'"

In an interview with Mr. William Senour of Stockton the following facts peculiar to his case were stated:

"Four years ago I was obliged to give up my business on account of sickness, which soon proved to be a complication of Kidney and Liver complaints. My liver was greatly enlarged and appeared to be growing hard until at last it felt like a stone. It also appeared growing fast to my side. My right side was almost paralyzed. My body was so bloated I could not wear my clothes, and I was confined to my bed. My sufferings were intense; the best physicians pronounced me incurable, and said it was only a question of time when I must die. While in this condition I commenced the use of Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure. The first bottle gave me relief, and I continued to take it, and steadily improved. The swelling gradually grew less, and the hardness left leaving my side soft and free from pain. I now feel as well as I ever did in my life. My right side is again strong. If I had not been for this medicine I expect I would be in my grave."

From our conclusion can be drawn from the above facts by any fair minded individual. That Kidney difficulties are of a serious character, and that they are easily contracted, and that a certain means in which they can be avoided, or, having been contracted, a way by which they can positively removed.

BISHOP NULTY INTERVIEWED.

agitation—chiefly because it destroys both the arbitrary power and the social prestige of the landed class, in enabling the tenant to appeal from the landlords, who hitherto have had the sole voice in fixing the rent, to a court in which that power has been vested and also in securing to a considerable extent, not only substantial security of tenure but tenant's rights in improvements they may create or have created. The tenant-farmers, the Bishop remarked, have been no better than slaves hitherto, because their peace of mind, physical welfare, the very privilege of living in the home built by their own parents, in which they were born—their right to live on the farms that their ancestors had reclaimed by their toil—all depended on the caprice or will of an irresponsible landlord, who could call on the civil power to back him in enforcing his behests.

Irish Crops Destroyed.

LONDON, August 29.—The destruction of crops by rain in various parts of Ireland is very great.

How They Treat "John" in Canada.

CHICAGO, August 29.—A special from Kingston, Ontario, Canada, says: Yung Lee, a Chinaman, who recently commenced business here, is having a miserable time of it. The police have to watch him most of the time, because when left unguarded, he is assaulted and pelted so much. On several occasions he pursued his tormentors with an axe. He says that in China the first time a man is insulted he knocks the other down. The second time he cuts his head off, and the Celestial thinks he ought to do the same here.

Gambetta and the Catholics.

PARIS, August 29.—Paul Berts, a lecturer on educational better, has made a violent attack on the Catholic religion and its system of education. The presence of Gambetta on such an occasion is considered significant, particularly as, after the lecture, he landed Berts at one who not only had antecedents, but had also a future.

Two Naval Officers Killed by the Explosion of a Torpedo.

NEWPORT (R. I.), August 29.—Lieutenant-Commander H. L. Edes and Lieutenant L. R. Spaulding were instantly killed this afternoon in this harbor while experimenting with torpedoes. Both officers were in the inner harbor in a torpedo launch, and were putting a torpedo in position in order to exhibit an experiment to Admiral Porter, who has been here several days. The torpedo was to be exploded by the breaking of an electric circuit. Edes had the deadly mistake in his hands while Spaulding was rowing the launch. The tide was low and the torpedo was planted in about three fathoms of water. Near by was a steam launch with the remainder of the class under instruction on board. Admiral Porter, Commander Selfridge and the officers of the Government torpedo station were on float island, where the torpedo station is located, for the purpose of witnessing the experiment. Edes leaned forward to arrange the apparatus in the water, when a loud noise and explosion was heard, and the bodies of the unfortunate men were seen in the air. It was a terrible sight. Admiral Porter and the remainder of the officers stood appalled at the sight of the bodies, which had been literally blown to fragments. They went up in the air some thirty-five feet and with them ascended the debris of the boat which they had employed.

Market Report.

Domestic Produce Market.

MONDAY OVENING, Sept. 1, 1881.

FLOUR—City Extras are jobbing at $5 @5 25; City Superfine, $4 75@$5 25; interior brands $5 25@$5 50 for extra, and $4 50@$5 for superfine.

WHEAT—Business continues quiet. Exporters are out of the market, and millers are picking up small lots here and there. Ships are still arriving slowly and freights are as strong as ever, an item that keeps down the price of wheat here. The Produce Exchange to-day sold not one, it was literally a week day. Sales reported today were: 13,000 ctls new Port Costa delivery, and 1,000 ctls old No. 1, $1 37½; 600 ctls slightly inferior milling, $1 36½; 1,200 ctls do, and 2,000 ctls No. 2, $1 35; 80 tons off grade, $1 30, and 300 ctls do, $1 35. No. 1 is quotable at $1 37½@$1 40, and No. 2 at $1 32½@$1 35 cash.

BARLEY—The demand is by no means urgent as it has been, and prices are rather weak. Sales to day were fair, as follows: 670 ctls good feed $1 17½, and 250 ctls dark good do, $1 15. Choice to fancy feed $1 20. Brewing is quotable at $1 25@$1 35; Coast Chevalier, $1 17½@$1 20; standard Chevalier, nominal.

OATS—Sales reported today of 200 and 300 ctls feed, $1 50; 600 ctls common do, $1 45, and 300 ctls do, $1 40. Good and choice, $1 50@$1 62½; common $1 30@$1 37½; Surprise, $1 45@$1 65.

CORN—Continues firmly held. Sale of 150 ctls large at $1 15. Small round Yellow is quotable at $1 20, and large do, $1 12½.

HAY—No barley here. The market is quiet. Wheat, old, $10@$12; wildoats, $9@$10; barley and stalk, $7@$10; cow, $8@$9 50 ⅌ ton.

The Doctors Disagree

As to the best methods and remedies, for the cure of constipation and disordered liver and kidneys. But those that have used Kidney-Wort, agree that it is by far the best medicine known. Its action is prompt, thorough and lasting. Liquid or Dry.

Some people prefer to purchase medicines in the dry state so that they can see for themselves that they are purely vegetable. Others have not the time or desire to prepare the medicine, and wish it all ready to use.

To accommodate each class the proprietors of Kidney-Wort now offer that well known remedy in both liquid and dry forms.

Sold by druggists everywhere.—Tribune.

AN EDEN EARTH.

If life were a thing that is deathless,
And pleasure no baird maid to pain;
If the white lips of anger were breathless
And loving the spirit of gain;
If beauty and youth were immortal,
And upward the path they pursue;
If the spirit of love were eternal,
And pure like the good and true.

If the green earth in peace were repeating,
Not red with the blood of the slain;
If hands were uplifted in blessing,
Not in smite in the spirit of Cain;
If true were the hopes of the elder,
That are dead like wild flowers on the wold,
This earth were the confines of Eden,
And men as the children of God.

The False Inheritance.

A TRUE CATHOLIC STORY.

WRITTEN FOR THE MONITOR BY A CALIFORNIA CONTRIBUTOR.

The valley of the Susquehanna stretches broad and fertile, with its thriving cities, busy towns, and thriving villages, fair with fertile fields and fruitful orchards, while beneath its broad bosom, teeming with such active life, lie the mysterious chambers of King Coal, where the stout-hearted and strong-armed miners go down day by day to face death in murky caverns hidden from the light and glory of the day. It is a sad sight to look upon, and so thought James O'Neal, as he leaned from his chamber window, beholding all that had grown so dear to him, and tracing the past events of his life, the life that was now drawing so rapidly to its close.

Fresh from his Irish home, five and twenty years ago, he had paused at the door of this farmhouse, weary, footsore, and penniless, worn with the privations of the emigrant ship and his tramp from Philadelphia, resolved to take the first work offered, no matter how hard or how slight the compensation to be received in return. The Autumn leaves were carpeting the roadside with gorgeous dye, and winds blew chilly, warning of colder days to be, so when Hendrik Meyer offered the young emigrant a position in his employ he gladly accepted it, and became a member of the Dutch farmer's family. Hendrik Meyer was a hard man; miserly in disposition, watchful and suspicious in all matters and yet universally disliked by all his neighbors. A short time before O'Neal's arrival at the farm, the only son, a frank, generous, handsome young fellow had been driven from home, his offense being that of wedding a dowerless bride, pretty Margaret Van Eaton, when his father had chosen for him Katrina Stone, a woman years his senior, but whose fortune was assured, for she was an only child and at her father's death would inherit a well stocked farm which adjoined Meyers own broad acres, and which he longed with all a miser's longing to possess. And for this Frederick Meyer was an outcast from home, his name was never mentioned, but O'Neal often saw tears dim the eyes of Mrs. Meyer great with tears as she would follow the road, yearning with the privations of the emigrant ship and his tramp from Philadelphia, resolved to take the first work offered, no matter how hard or how slight the compensation to be received in return. The Autumn leaves were carpeting the roadside with gorgeous dye, and winds blew chilly, warning of colder days to be, so when Hendrik Meyer offered the young emigrant a position in his employ he gladly accepted it, and became a member of the Dutch farmer's family. Hendrik Meyer was a hard man; miserly in disposition, watchful and suspicious in all matters and yet universally disliked by all his neighbors. A short time before O'Neal's arrival at the farm, the only son, a frank, generous, handsome young fellow had been driven from home, his offense being that of wedding a dowerless bride, pretty Margaret Van Eaton, when his father had chosen for him Katrina Stone, a woman years his senior, but whose fortune was assured, for she was an only child and at her father's death would inherit a well stocked farm which adjoined Meyers own broad acres, and which he longed with all a miser's longing to possess. And for this Frederick Meyer was an outcast from home, his name was never mentioned, but O'Neal often saw tears dim the eyes of Mrs. Meyer great with tears as she watched the roadway, and saw in the distance some form which resembled that of her absent boy, but such flashes of feeling were never displayed before her husband, and son many years had passed away the kind-hearted woman was laid to rest with the husband who had preceded her, in the stone-walled churchyard on the hill. Some said that she was glad to die, for Hendrik Meyer's temper did not improve with age, and life had grown to be one wearisome round of labor sone duties, unchecked by a single ray of kindness or love.

After her death there was a change in the life at the farm, always hard it became harder; where dollars were once spent grudgingly, dimes were as sparingly used, and the domestic affairs, which under the rule of Mrs. Meyer always preserved some show of comfort and plenty, under her husband's administration looked bleak and desolate; the rudest of fare, and often stinted in quantity, greeted the toil-worn laborers, and soon, one after another, the old servants sought new and more comfortable situations, all O'Neal stayed on. His master had taken a strong fancy to the young Irishman and was ever prompt in approving his efforts to please.

James O'Neal was a Catholic, and when he first came to America practised his religion faithfully, but there were obstacles to surmount, and little by little a spirit of indifference crept upon him, rendering the performance of duties, once pleasant, extremely irksome, and coward at heart he shrank from the ridicule of his companions and the cynical sneer of his master, until at last he ceased altogether to conform to the teachings of the faith of his fathers. And at the same fatal time he severed all connection with the parents whose love and prayers followed him night and day; he dared not write to them lest their keen eyes might detect his faithlessness, and then, their letters were constant reminders of his weakness, for the mother so proud of her handsome boy and the father of his son whose talents had received a more than ordinary share of cultivation, wrote him often, always closing with an earnest appeal to him to be true to his religion, and not for worlds would he have them know that he was false. It was many years ago when the last letter came over sea complaining of his long silence, and begging for a few words to comfort the hearts of the old father and mother before they passed away to the rest for which they were crazing. A sad, pathetic letter, but it reached O'Neal at an inauspicious moment and was thrust half read into a drawer, whence it was to some forth at a distant day to lash, as a scourge of scorpions, the soul of a remorseful man.

Fifteen years passed, and Mr. Meyer was called home suddenly from the transaction of accumulations of years, and to the surprise of many, James O'Neal became owner of the dead man's estate, by a deed duly signed and witnessed, which stated that Hendrik Meyer, being indebted to James O'Neal, and having lost large sums in recent speculations, gave to him the farm and stock in payment of the debt which had been accumulating for years at a heavy rate of interest. Every thing had been done in strict accordance to law; accounts were presented to prove the validity of the claim which the deed mentioned. A small sum of money, which had been his mother's and which she had wished to give Frederick, but her husband had retained during his lifetime, was now left to him. He had hastened down to the farm when he learned of his father's illness but reached it too late to see him alive, and when he heard that no message of forgiveness awaited him he exclaimed: "O my God! My God! I did not think that my father would have carried his hatred and resentment against me into the presence of The Judgement seat. If your mother has been used against me," he added, turning to O'Neal, "I pray that the good God, who sees the hearts of all, may judge between us, and if you have wronged me, mete out to you the punishment you deserve!" with those solemn words he turned from his boyhood's home and went back to his daily toil in a distant city.

When James O'Neal entered into possession of his property he laid aside the parsimonious habits of years and spent both time and money in rendering the old farmhouse and its surroundings more attractive. His wife, his countrymen call a "lucky man;" everything he undertook prospered; his investments were always judicious, his cattle brought the best prices, his fields, when his crops never failed, and his harvests were ever secured at the right moment. The Stone farm was thrown upon the market and sold at a ruinous sacrifice, for Katrina wedded late in life a spy young gallant who squandered old Stone's hard-earned dollars, and wearying of country life sold the old homestead, to seek in the city more congenial companions. O'Neal became the purchaser of the long coveted property, and little by little added to the estate when he came to be regarded as the wealthiest man in the county.

His friends, for he had many since he acquired riches, urged him to marry, but he told them that he had no time for wooing, sometime, perhaps, he would bring a mistress to his handsome home, but not just yet, and they were left to console themselves with this excuse. In the busy world he was ever bland, smiling and courteous, and there were hours, in the solitude of his chamber, when he seemed to face, with terror in his eyes, some haunting spectre; and there was one hour in every day, when his health failed and the physicians told him he must rest—he was overwrought, brain and body alike required repose, and he ought to seek it in change of scene, so he spent some time journeying from place to place only to return more worn and disheartened than ever to his own home. The best medical skill of the State had proved vain, and so he spent the long, bright summer days wandering aimlessly from room to room, or loitering wearily in the flower-scented garden, striving to read, to do anything but think. Standing one day in the apartment which had been his previous to Mr. Meyer's death and which had remained unfurnished ever since, but kept as all things about his dwelling were, in scrupulous order, he opened the drawer into which years before he had thrust that last letter from his Irish home. Turning over some old papers in a listless manner his attention fell upon it; yielding to a sudden impulse, he drew it forth and read it to the close, which was a wail that sounded "Live your life, my son, so purely that you may meet death without fear, for death is the close of life, and after death there is the judgment. Do not bring into the presence of your Judge any wrong unrepented, any debt unacknowledged, but where fortune has served in riches unjustly acquired. Be true to your faith and cease not to pray that you may be kept from temptation, and that His good Angels be with you to guide and bless you, my son."

"After death the judgment!" How the words seemed to burn into his brain. They had been shining before him for many days. During his recent wanderings he had taken shelter from a shower in a Catholic church as an eloquent divine was preaching on the special judgment following death, and the sermon had stirred the deep fountains of his soul which had lain in darkness and silence, since he had ceased to be a Judge! Oh! No! No! And while he was striving to drown the still small voice that fain would make himself heard, here was this letter, a voice from the dead, with its awful words of warning; he put the fateful epistle into his pocket and went from the lofty chamber, and leaning against the window, stood with lingering, loving eyes, on the beautiful panorama spread before him. He must leave it all soon, and forever; the doctor had told him that he was a doomed man unless the fast-failing strength was renewed, and nothing short of a miracle could restore him; death cannot be kept at bay much longer. Even as he gazed, the sickening giddiness come upon him, and he fell fainting to the floor, where he was found by his servants, who placed him with careful hands in the bed they had left vacant for years, and where he was carried forth to the grave. Physicians came and looked grave; this was a disease they could not fathom, but it seemed near a fatal termination, consultations were held, and then one of the most celebrated announced his decision to him—his fate was sealed; he might linger yet for a few days, or he might pass away in the sun would rise again to see the wake of his love.

He listened in silence and then moaned bitterly, for so soon, death so soon, and after death the judgment! He seemed a victim to despair; but when the physician asked him if there was any business matter he wished to settle, if he were ready for the final judgment; he answered, after a fierce internal struggle: "Send for a Catholic priest. I cannot die as I have lived, there is much to be done and time is short; oh! so short."

His commands were hastily obeyed. The pastor of the parish hastened to the bedside of the dying man, eager to bring back to the fold the poor soul that had strayed so long in barren and desolate pastures. He found the sick man waiting impatiently for his coming, and when he left the house, after being closeted with its owner for hours, he bore in his hand a roll of freshly-written manuscript, and begging for a few words to comfort the hearts of the old father and mother before they passed away to the rest for which they were crazing. A sad, pathetic letter, but it reached O'Neal at an inauspicious moment and was thrust half read into a drawer, whence it was to some forth at a distant day to lash, as a scourge of scorpions, the soul of a remorseful man.

A SINGULAR GRACE.

Remarkable Conversion of and Unfaithful Priest.

[From the Ave Maria.]

The infinite mercy of Almighty God sometimes displays itself in the most wonderful and most unexpected manner. The following letter, giving details in this particular, is a striking illustration of this.

"I was for several years a faithful priest, but from various causes, and chiefly in consequence of having entered the priestly state without a true vocation, I had at last sunk so low that I abandoned my post, and wished to marry. I even renounced my Catholic faith and turned Protestant. I made my profession of Protestantism, and was soon afterwards called to officiate in the town of X. There I became engaged to the daughter of a Protestant merchant, and the wedding was to take place in six weeks. One evening I was sitting in company with the Protestant pastor C., and a young student of theology. We were in the arbor of the minister's garden. Suddenly there came a summons for the pastor to attend a dying person. 'Will you not go conferre? the pastor said to me. 'Your that exercise of the military amongst us will be rather a sad one, but I cannot very well leave my guests.' I signified my readiness, and followed the messenger, who conducted me to the bedside of a man whose days on earth were evidently numbered.

"I am the new preacher, and have come instead of the pastor, who is engaged,' I said, looking into the pale face of the dying man. He shook his head sadly.

"'There is a mistake,' he said; 'I sent for a Catholic priest.'

"'Are you not a member of the Evangelical Church?' I asked in surprise. 'I was told—'

"'Yes yes,' he said, interrupting me, 'but I wish to see a Catholic.'

"'How is that?' I then inquired. 'Do you not believe in the Lord Jesus, who died for us on the Cross. If you believe firmly in Him, and put your trust in Him, He will be merciful and judge to you.' The dying man smiled bitterly.

"'Faith alone will not help me,' he answered. 'I want to make my confession and receive absolution. I was once a Catholic priest! I abandoned my faith and became a Protestant. I knew what faith alone will not suffice, but it seems that Heaven refuses me the last grace, that of being attended by a true priest and to receive absolution.'

"He heaved a deep sigh, and the tears rolled down his pallid cheeks. I had a feeling impossible for me to express. What a meeting! what a spectacle! Catholic priest, the death-bed of another fallen priest! The condition of the sick man was such as to admit of no delay.

"'If you were a Catholic priest,' said I, 'you know that in this presence of death every other priest has plenary powers. I was also a priest; I spatulated like you, but I am a Protestant now. You know that I know what at this moment, when death is at the door, I have the power to receive absolution, and to give you absolution.'

"He looked at me with wonder, and when I repeated my words, a smile transform my pale cadaverous countenance. He reached out his hand to me, and he received with a kind of sincere error, and died soon afterwards.

"What I felt in that hour I will not attempt to describe. Was not this meeting a warning from Heaven to me? My cheeks were nearly as pale as those of the corpse and my eye remained fixed in a motionless gaze on the hope that I had just saved from the cold, dead hand in mine, and was enabled to pale over the opening chasm of destruction which I was madly rushing.

"I resigned my office in the Protestant pastor's residence. I resigned the position of preacher, and I resigned my bride to forget me. I am going to a Trappist monastery, to try to expiate my guilt by a life of penance. May Heaven be merciful to me!"

He kept his resolution faithfully, and till his death, twelve years after, he did nothing but lead a life of most rigorous penance in the retreat he had chosen.

Another Deserted Irish Village.

Rev. James P. Ryan in his paper on "Ireland and the Irish" in the September Catholic World, thus describes the present state of the Irish village: "Here, there, is a beside that forlorn-looking relic of departed greatness, Galway, the ancient 'City of the Tribes.' In, I think, the largest fishing village in all Ireland. It is called the Claddagh. Of late years the population of this place had imbibed some very pretentious from reading Mrs. Sadlier's swearing story, Maurice Tierney, and I fancy that the people of its people I confess that all the poetry soon wooed out of me. Like Galway itself, the Claddagh has good bones in it, and I forgiver what it once was. One of the fishermen, with whom I fell into conversation, bitterly lamented the decay which this native village had fallen. "Three thousand men," he said, "without counting the women and boys, once gathered round O'Connell on this spot, and now the whole village could hardly muster 500 men." A more picturesque-looking place, truly, is the Claddagh now, whatever it was in the days of its historic greatness, when no policeman dare show his nose in its narrow lanes or attempt within its sacred limits to arrest one of its stately inhabitants. A great part of the Claddagh people were forced to leave their native village, and many of these, or their children are now settled at Gloucester, Mass., and what is left of the Claddagh by the Galway bay is but an unsightly assemblage of thatched cabins, whose rickety doors, as they turnon their rusty hinges, seem to grate out mournful lays for days that are gone, and whose broken windows allow free egress to the sighs and prayers that go out nightly over the waters of the ocean in search of the Claddagh exiles settled on Beacon bay.

THE JINERS.

She was about forty-five years old well-formed, tall, black hair, black eyes, slightly tinged with gray, and eyes in which gleamed the fire of a determination not easily to be quenched. She walked into Major Hughes's office in Patten's block, and, requested a private interview, and having shut the door, and satisfied herself that the law students were not listening at the keyhole, said, slowly, solemnly, and impressively.

"I want a divorce."

"Why, Jinerd? I supposed you had one of the best of husbands," said the major.

"I suppose that's what everybody thinks, but if they knew what I've suffered in ten years, they'd wonder. I hadn't scalded him long ago, I ought to, but for the sake of my young ones I've borne it and said nothing. I've told him though what he might depend on, and now the time's come; I won't stand it; young ones or no young ones, I'll have a divorce, and if the neighbors want to know the reason why, tell them they can, for I won't stand it another day."

"But what's the matter! Don't your husband provide for you! Isn't he true to you! Doesn't he treat you kindly!" pursued the lawyer.

"We get victuals enough, and I don't know that he's a true and kind husband in general; and he's never knocked none of us down. I wish he had, then I'd get him into jail and know where he was nights," retorted the woman.

"Then what is your complaint against him!"

"Well, if you must know, he's one of them jumpy jiners."

"A what!"

"A jiner, one of them jerky fools that's always a jumpin' somethin' or other, or nothing come along that's dark and sly and hidden but he'll jine it. If anybody should get up a new religion, he'd be one of the first he'd jine it just as soon as he could get in, and if they had to pray to get in he'd go down on the cross. If you believe firmly in Him, and put your trust in Him, He will be merciful and judge to you.' The dying man smiled bitterly.

"'Faith alone will not help me,' he answered. 'I want to make my confession and receive absolution. I was once a Catholic priest! I abandoned my faith and became a Protestant. I know what faith alone will not suffice, but it seems that Heaven refuses me the last grace, that of being attended by a true priest and to receive absolution.'

"He heaved a deep sigh, and the tears rolled down his pallid cheeks. I had a feeling impossible for me to express. What a meeting! what a spectacle! Catholic priest, the death-bed of another fallen priest! The condition of the sick man was such as to admit of no delay.

"'If you were a Catholic priest,' said I, 'you know that in this presence of death every other priest has plenary powers. I was also a priest; I apostatized like you, but I am a Protestant now. You know that I know what at this moment, when death is at the door, I have the power to receive absolution, and to give you absolution.'

"He looked at me with wonder, and when I repeated my words, a smile transform my pale cadaverous countenance. He reached out his hand to me, and he received with a kind of sincere error, and died soon afterwards.

"What I felt in that hour I will not attempt to describe. Was not this meeting a warning from Heaven to me? My cheeks were nearly as pale as those of the corpse and my eye remained fixed in a motionless gaze on the hope that I had just saved from the cold, dead hand in mine, and was enabled to pale over the opening chasm of destruction which I was madly rushing.

"I resigned my office in the Protestant pastor's residence. I resigned the position of preacher, and I resigned my bride to forget me. I am going to a Trappist monastery, to try to expiate my guilt by a life of penance. May Heaven be merciful to me!"

He kept his resolution faithfully, and till his death, twelve years after, he did nothing but lead a life of most rigorous penance in the retreat he had chosen.

Another Deserted Irish Village.

Rev. James P. Ryan in his paper on "Ireland and the Irish" in the September Catholic World, thus describes the present state of the Irish village: "Here, there, is a beside that forlorn-looking relic of departed greatness, Galway, the ancient 'City of the Tribes.' In, I think, the largest fishing village in all Ireland. It is called the Claddagh. Of late years the population of this place had imbibed some very pretentious from reading Mrs. Sadlier's swearing story, Maurice Tierney, and I fancy that the people of its people I confess that all the poetry soon wooed out of me. Like Galway itself, the Claddagh has good bones in it, and I forgiver what it once was. One of the fishermen, with whom I fell into conversation, bitterly lamented the decay which this native village had fallen. "Three thousand men," he said, "without counting the women and boys, once gathered round O'Connell on this spot, and now the whole village could hardly muster 500 men." A more picturesque-looking place, truly, is the Claddagh now, whatever it was in the days of its historic greatness, when no policeman dare show his nose in its narrow lanes or attempt within its sacred limits to arrest one of its stately inhabitants. A great part of the Claddagh people were forced to leave their native village, and many of these, or their children are now settled at Gloucester, Mass., and what is left of the Claddagh by the Galway bay is but an unsightly assemblage of thatched cabins, whose rickety doors, as they turnon their rusty hinges, seem to grate out mournful lays for days that are gone, and whose broken windows allow free egress to the sighs and prayers that go out nightly over the waters of the ocean in search of the Claddagh exiles settled on Beacon bay.

IRISHMEN IN FRANCE.

The Irishmen who first opened relations with France were more Parliament than men of their successors. They went as Christian teachers, and some of them left an enduring name behind them. At that time Ireland was in her golden age; and France was only the growing, the young, the formed from an inchtes and kingdoms in every side of her. When Irishmen landed on the shores of France at the end of the 14th or the beginning of the seventh century, they carried a pilgrim's staff, a leather water-bottle, a wallet, and the book of Celtic. Preaching was their great vocation, and very earnest and outspoken they seem to have been; according to all saintly legends. Their lives, however, were too austere for the taste of the Neustrian and Austrasian churchmen of the period. Some of them were driven from the degenerate Merovingian princes because of their taste for erysipelas unpalatable truths. They undertook secular martial work of all sorts. Some of them were local anchorites, and underwent most severe penalties of self-torture; others of them founded important religious houses; most of them wandering from place to place seeking to stir up fresh religious enthusiasm. Many a few of them ended into the calendar of the Gallican Church.

Every change in the political fortunes of Ireland, in her relations to the Anglo-Norman government to the government of the Tudors, Cromwell, the Stewarts, and the House of Brunswick, determined a fresh exodus to earl the shores of France. In the latter half of the seventeenth and throughout the whole of the eighteenth centuries, France rather than England was the natural home of the Irishman. Fighting with his short-sighted allegiance to an intolerant kind of Catholicism, was not sorry to part with hundreds of thousands of his subjects because they were Huguenots. Irishmen who were Catholic he made welcome to his service, and he encouraged the Irish gens d'armes he was so pleased that he enrolled himself captain over them. In the train of James II. many Irishmen came to Paris, and, when there, the house of Cardinal de Bouillon was their hospitable home. The Cardinal had a certain sympathy with the attitude of his guests because he was himself rebellously minded.

Some idea of the number of Irishmen who crossed to France in the first half of the eighteenth century may be formed from an estimate made from the records of the French War Office that 450,000 Irishmen died in French service. O'Connell, Macmahons, Dillons, Harrys, and O'Brienes abounded in the French regiments, and they fought with much distinction against England through the entire War of the Spanish Succession. The service in France was not always chosen as the way to success. The brothers O'Hogerty have left a lasting impression in Brittany and Touraine, where they rose to distinction in law and agriculture. The brothers O'Donnell, of Donegal, lived underry, and while one of them became a respectable economist, the other was created Count and Marshal, and acquired a reputation as a model farmer. If Irishmen were drawn to France in the earlier part of the century, they were driven to America in larger exodus. Not less than half a million are believed to have served and died before the Revolution of 1848 in Austria, and through the Seven Years' War England had no more determined opponents; they were on every Continental field, and the flag of their adopted country was not always the winning one. Many of them, too,

THE MONITOR.

TWENTY-FOURTH YEAR OF PUBLICATION.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

WEDNESDAY..... SEPTEMBER 28.

TO THE CLERGY AND LAITY OF THE DIOCESE OF SAN FRANCISCO.

We stated briefly, but clearly, in our late Pastoral, to which we refer—the evident necessity of removing our Cathedral from its present objectionable location to some more respectable and more suitable portion of the city.

We also pointed out the serious obligation of all the Catholics throughout the Diocese to cooperate generously in the erection of a new St. Mary's, the site and building of which will necessarily require the aid of all.

As intimated in said Pastoral, we have appointed the Rev. John B. McNally the collector for that great work, chiefly in the parishes outside of this city.

Therefore, we recommend the said Rev. Gentleman to each and all the Pastors of the Diocese, with a view that they will henceforth as seldom listen to preaching to the people on the great object, and collecting for the same. And we also earnestly request the Catholics of the Diocese to listen to his exhortations and offer him their liberal contributions.

The clergy of the Cathedral have promised to offer the holy sacrifice of the Mass twice a month for the restitution—once for the living and once for the dead.

Hoping that all will generously respond to them, Our Letters, and begging the blessing of God on all, I remain your humble and devoted servant in Christ,

✠ JOSEPH S. ALEMANY, O. P.,
ARCHBISHOP OF SAN FRANCISCO.

ST. MARY'S CATHEDRAL, Sept. 23, 1881.

St. Peter's as Seen by a Scurrilous Sectarian.

The Christian Advocate of this city continued some European correspondence last week which contains some of the most scurrilous remarks concerning the Church we have ever seen fall from the poisonous pen of the most rabid ranter. The letters are signed "O.G.," and are dated from Rome, where the incendiaries Methodist who concocted them is at present sojourning.

Here is the manner in which this scurrilous scribe speaks of one of the grandest of God's temples on earth:

"From San 'Pietro Romani' and the Colosseum to St. Peter's in Rome is a contrast of the old with the new, ancient with modern; but to me it was also a comparison of one form of idolatry with another. The one, regardless of expense, seems, there is, perhaps, nothing in the world world to accord this monument to Popery. It is called a church or cathedral, and probably many an American reader imagines that congregations of worshipers throng this ample temple to worship the God of Heaven. But that is a mistake. Neither St. Peter's nor St. Paul's in Rome could ever have been intended as places of worship for poor, doubtful humanity. In the first place, they are built in the outskirts of the city, too far removed from the mass of the people; in the second place, there are no seats provided for worshipers; and, besides, the polished mosaic marble flooring and all the inlaid richly rich adornments would soon be defaced and injured by frequent gatherings of the people. Individual worshipers, both rich and poor, come and go and worship at some of the numerous shrines or chapels of this monstrous temple."

How depraved a mind must the man have possessed who could thus disparagingly speak of St. Peter's, will best be understood when we introduce the testimony of respectable non-Catholics who have seen and admired the great sanctuary of God which has elevated the enthusiasm of intelligent men of all creeds, from the splendor of its architecture and the magnificence of its detail. Gibbon, the historian, was so amazed at the grandeur of St. Peter's that, notwithstanding all his well-known anti-Catholic bias, he could not refrain from proclaiming it "the most glorious structure that ever has been applied to the use of religion," yet this miserable Methodist mudsill calls it "monstrous temple." Byron, with all his levity, beheld in St. Peter's a fit subject for poetic inspiration, and in Childe Harold he poured forth his admiration in this noble apostrophe:

"But thee, of temples old, or altars new,
Standest alone—with nothing like to thee—
Worthiest of God, the holy and the true.
Since Zion's desolation, when that He
Forsook His temple city, what could be,
Barred heaven against the prayer of mortality.
Of a sublimer aspect! Majesty,
Power, glory, strength and beauty—all are aisled
In this eternal ark of worship unfolded!

This is Byron's tribute to the noblest work of earth dedicated to the true worship of God. Yet the Methodist mole his' the impertinence to say that "this whole thing is simply a monument to Popery. It is not for the worship or glory of God."

O Goose! Your loud cackle makes many men laugh—
'Tis the brey of a mule in the skin of a calf!

The first objection made to St. Peter's and St. Paul's by the mind-barren Methodist is that they are "too far removed from the mass of the people," the illiterate itinerant not knowing that the sites chosen for many sacred temples are the same upon which the blood of the martyrs was shed, and that the places thus sanctified by Christian blood are always chosen by the Church in ancient lands as the best sites whereon to erect temples for the worship of that God for whose glory they suffered death. The Methodist, upon therefore exhibits his ignorance as well as his virulence in the first reason he gives for his cackle about these churches. The second reason given by this shallow scribe is the lazy man's plea that "no seats are provided for worshipers." This is a very natural conclusion coming from an effeminate specimen of the Evangelical sham called Methodism. Catholics worship God on their knees, and not seated in the soft-cushioned pews of modern Protestantism—hence, there were no seats to be found in any of the great cathedrals of Europe until within a recent time, when Catholics copied the Protestant innovation, and the pew system attained prominence. Even in many of the churches of Ireland, to this day, there are no seats to be found for the reason that the proper attitude of the pious in prayer does not require them. Methodists like this Micawber we are noticing, go to their meeting-houses in order to loll away an hour in the perfumed presence of painted women, and to listen to the songs of Sion sung by the syrens of the organ loft. But Catholics go to church in order to render true worship to God who has declared that "every knee shall bow to Me," and whose prayer in the garden of Gethsemane was made while prostrate upon the earth. Kneeling, therefore, is the proper posture for those who believe—as we Catholics do—that Almighty God is really and truly present in our churches in the adorable Sacrament of the Eucharist, but in the fashionable follies called Protestant churches, this obligation does not hold—for the reason that many of the so-called worshipers have no belief whatever in the Scriptural text which declares the house of God to be "a house of prayer," but, on the contrary, they often make it a veritable "den of thieves."

The Methodist maligner of two of the grandest Catholic churches in Christendom announces his fear that the floors and ornaments of St. Peter's and St. Paul's would be defaced and injured by frequent gatherings of the people, but he forgets that Catholics are not vandals like so many of his ilk who stole and destroyed all the Catholic treasures they could purloin from the cathedrals of Europe. Every article dedicated to the service of God in Catholic churches is sacred in the eyes of Catholics, and they are respected and preserved with that reverence which was bestowed on the Ark of the Covenant in the Old Law. In Methodist conventicles there is nothing worthy of respect, reverence or preservation; all is of the earth earthy, and our Methodist Micawber was merely judging Catholics from the wrong standpoint when he ignorantly imagined that sacrilege or vandalism could be perpetrated by them in their own churches.

Thus we have disposed of the aspersions of this Popery-hating Pharisee. One who could see no glory in the heavens above him if his imagination could picture for him a single Papist in possession thereof. Bigotry blinds its votaries so that they can discern no beauty in the cathedrals which Catholics have erected; but, nevertheless, they are objects of rich regard for men of intelligence—regardless of religious creed—who see in them the sublimity of art and the triumph of human genius. The sordid mind of this Methodist could never reach that elevated standard of civilized intelligence, so we leave him to grovel in the gutter of the garbage which best suits his carnal and clannish nature.

The Contemplated New Cathedral.

We call the attention of our readers to the Circular Letter of ARCHBISHOP ALEMANY which we publish in the present issue and ask them to cheerfully co-operate with Father J. B. McNally in his efforts to collect sufficient funds to erect a Cathedral in this city worthy of the faith of the Catholics of California.

His Grace has already set forth the necessity which exists for the erection of such an edifice in the Pastoral which we published a few weeks ago, and Father McNally has already started on his mission of mercy in which his success will entirely depend upon the liberality of those of the household of faith who glory in contributing towards every work inaugurated for the greater honor and glory of God. Aside from this reward promised by Almighty God to all who give even "a glass of cold water" in His name, the spiritual benefits to be derived from the bestowal of offerings for the proposed Cathedral will be duly appreciated by Catholics in every portion of the Archdiocese. The priests attached to the present Cathedral have volunteered to offer up the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass every two weeks for the spiritual and temporal necessities of all who give alms towards this great work, and this fact alone in the eyes of the faithful should be sufficient incentive to all intelligent Catholics to bestow liberal donations towards this great work of Christian charity. "The Lord loves a cheerful giver" and those whom the Lord loves are likely to be blessed in this world and happy hereafter.

Davitt's Speeches.

The Land League of Ireland has wisely resolved to have the anti-tithing speeches delivered by Michael Davitt, subsequent to his return from America, printed and circulated among the people. This is indeed a wise resolve, as the seed thus sown in the hearts of the people everywhere will keep alive the spirit of liberty. Davitt's prestige is not diminished by his imprisonment. His patriotism, and the penance which he is paying for its exercise, has enshrined him in the hearts of the honorable everywhere, and his words will ring in the ears of the landlord classes of all countries long after God for whose glory they suffered death. The Methodist parson therefore exhibits his ignorance as well as his virulence in the first reason he gives for his cackle about these churches. The second reason given by this shallow scribe is the lazy man's plea that "no seats are provided for worshipers." This is a very natural conclusion coming from an effeminate specimen of the Evangelical sham called Methodism. Catholics worship God on their knees, and not seated in the soft-cushioned pews of modern Protestantism—hence, there were no seats to be found in any of the great cathedrals of Europe until within a recent time, when Catholics copied the Protestant innovation, and the pew system attained prominence. Even in many of the churches of Ireland, to this day, there are no seats to be found

"Bishop" McNamara's Misfortunes.

The poetic muse prompts us to say—both with truth and poetry—

A priest with a wife
Has a place all his life.

We think, too, that if that unfortunate fallen priest who has set himself up as the bogus "Bishop" of the so-called "American Catholic Church," could by any chance be induced to tell the truth, he would fully agree in sentiment with the Monitor on this matter. Ever one Luther fell in love with Catherine Von Bora, down to the miserable McNamara, all such alliances have proved so many periodical purgatories to the priests who polluted their souls through breaking their vows of chastity. Yesterday the misfortunes of McNamara culminated by his mock marriage, he has been kept literally in "hot water" by his seductive spouse. We learn from a late New York paper that he recently figured in the police courts there as the defendant in an assault and battery case, and that he had to appeal to the court to protect his buxom companion from the finger-nails of her neighbors! Verily, there is no rest for the wicked, and McNamara "knows how it is himself." Here are the proceedings in the case in question, as detailed by the imitator of Luther and Lojoon in his evidence:

"Father McNamara said that a few days ago, about 6 P. M., a crowd of 500 persons, headed by a woman, surrounded his house at 143 East 125th street, broke the panes and the shutters of his house, and finally forced the front door. Policeman Levy, he continued, instead of dispersing the crowd, rather egged them on. Going into details, he said that the woman had been a tenant of his, but that her husband had left, given up their rooms. Their furniture, however, still remained in the rooms. As the woman was not an agreeable person he took advantage of her having quitted the house temporarily to secure his windows and lock his door to prevent her return. When she did return she was aided by a young man, who burst in the front door with his knee. Policeman Levy saw the young man break in the door, but made no attempt to arrest him, although he was asked to do so by Father Gaegan, Father McNamara's assistant. The testimony was corroborated by Father Gaegan and Mrs. McNamara.

Policeman Levy said that he did all in his power to disperse the crowd, but could not interfere with the woman, at whose instance the door had been forced, as she was a tenant and had a right to enter.

Mrs. Le Tellier, who was the womanin the case, testified that she knew nothing of her husband having given up their rooms, and their furniture still remaining there, she sought entrance to what she still considered her home.

George McCoy said that he was the young man who broke open the door, and that he had done so in order that Mrs. Le Tellier would not be obliged to pass the night out of doors.

Half a dozen other witnesses testified that Policeman Levy had acted, in their opinion, properly.

While they were delivering their testimony, Father McNamara appealed to Commissioner Nichols to protect his wife from Mrs. Le Tellier, who, he said, had insulted her. Mrs. Le Tellier, who had been seen to make faces at Mrs. McNamara, was cautioned, and asked to remove to a distance from her, which she finally did.

What a beautiful specimen of humanity to be a "Bishop" in a new-fangled Church! Yet, these be thy gods, O Protestantism!

Effect of the Irish Land League Throughout Europe.

Future generations, not only in Ireland, but in every other portion of the civilized world, will rise up and bless the men and war on who originated, organized and sustained the cause of the Irish National Land League. Readers of the MONITOR are already familiar with the legislative benefits which have been secured to Ireland through the operations of the Land League, and now we are glad to be able to tell them that the principles proclaimed by Archbishop Croke, by Davitt and Parnell, have been promulgated and adopted by the peoples throughout the entire continent of Europe. England is already aroused on the question of the Land tenure; Scotland is asking for a land law similar to that granted by the British Parliament to Ireland; France is awakening to the fact that scarcely one-third of the agricultural domain is in the hands of the cultivators of the soil, and they, too, are demanding redress for their rent grievances at the hands of the landlord class. Germany is losing large masses of her agricultural laborers, and the farmers find that the increased wages they have to pay, together with the high rent for land, is rapidly involving them in bankruptcy. In Bavaria alone, nearly seven hundred peasant proprietors were evicted by their creditors in the first three months of the present year. In Italy, the people who reside in the rural regions are so poverty-stricken that the death-rate has considerably increased, and the Italian papers are calling out for a change in the land laws are the Italian husbandman becomes an architect rent. In the province of Naples nearly two thousand honest ds were sold for taxes during the past year, and the people then evicted have discovered that unjus ves discriminate in favor of the rich as against the poor; hence the demand is made for a change in the legislation regarding land tenure. Even in Russia, the serfs, who are the slaves of the landocracy, are beginning to imbibe the spirit sent abroad by the Irish people, and an agitation exists that we think will excite in enthusiasm anything of the kind ever known in the history of that country. Thus the world moves, and Ireland is the great lever that has lifted the agricultural class out of the slough of despond into which they were cast by land tyrants throughout the world.

GARFIELD'S OBSEQUIES.

Grandest Pageant Ever Seen on the Pacific.

Catholic Condolence with the Nation's Loss.

IRELAND'S SONS IN THE FUNERAL RANKS.

Twenty Thousand Men in the Throng.

San Francisco's tribute to the memory of our lamented President JAMES A. GARFIELD was the grandest ovation ever witnessed on this coast. The spontaneity of sorrow was universal and earnest, accentuated by the participation of men of all nationalities and of every religious persuasion who bended their sorrow in one common tribute of woe to their stricken land. Business of all kinds was entirely suspended, and expressions of sorrow were displayed from nearly every building in the city. The procession was the largest and most orderly ever witnessed, and the silence that was observed during the impressive ceremonies at the grave which deeply impressed all beholders.

THE PALL-BEARERS.

The following gentlemen acted as pall-bearers, following between the columns of regular officers of the Army and Navy:

General J. F. Miller, General Irvin McDowell, General S. B. Roseecrans, General Ord, Judge Terry, General Wagner, Commodore T. S. Phelps, Hon. Horace Davis, Hon. H. F. Dunbar, Hon. James T. Farley, Hon. R. Pacheco, Hon. J. P. Berry, Hon. A. W. Barney, Hon. Isaac Hofman, Hon. A. J. Bryant, Hon. M. F. Sullivan of Napa, Hon. Dudley Evans, Hon. Hon. N. W. Spaulding, Hon. J. H. Harmon, Hon. L. P. Fox, Hon. H. H. Haight, Hon. T. Harlston, Hon. J. P. Hoge, Hon. P. A. Roach, Hon. Joseph D. Finley, Hon. Walter Leake, Hon. D. English, Hon. W. P. Whitting, Hon. P. H. Cornwall, Esq., Colonel W. H. Dodge, Lieutenant-Colonel Hawkins, U. S. M. M., Hon. Jos. Law, L. Sachs, Esq.

A number of citizens and guard of citizens adjoiny followed with an immense wealth of natural flowers, relics, tributes and floral tributes, some of evergreen, over all twined smilax.

Then came the carriage of President of the Day, James H. Duffy, and Orator of the Day, George A. Knight.

THE FOREIGN CONSULS.

Following were 32 carriages in two columns, containing foreign Consuls, Judges, Justices of the Peace, and invited guests.

THE ADVANCED

The First Division of the exceedingly lengthy procession reached the junction of Third, Market and Kearny streets at about 11 10 a.m. The Chief of Police, with Captains Douglass and Shees on either side, on foot, preceded the pageant, followed by a platoon of the police.

Next came the Grand Marshal, J. W. Shaffer, also on foot, surrounded and escorted by his Chief of Staff, A. W. Preston, U. S. Navy, and Major W. B. Boeing, Chief Aid.

The Aide to the Grand Marshal, dressed in the conventional black, with crape on the left arm, and white rosettes, swept the street, twelve deep, from curb to curb.

THE FIRST DIVISION

comprised the Masonic Fraternity, followed by Artillery, Cavalry, and Infantry of the United States Army, together with nearly all the Militia companies of the State.

Following it was the second Artillery Battalion of the Militia, Major Hawes, U. S. A., commanding, and with nearly all the Militia Bands and Drum Corps.

St. Mary's Cathedral, T. A. B. and L. Society, marched in full regalia, led by Dennis Ryan. They were a large piece of crape on the left arm, and a small black rosette on the hat, with a portrait or likeness of General Garfield, with the words, "Our Dead President," and "Our Martyr President, A. Garfield." They carried an American flag, folded and covered with crape.

THIRTEENTH DIVISION.

This was an interesting division, as it represented nationalities of every grade of life and consequently, and the relationships that grow out of the mixed marriages of the Americans, the conspicuous components were the British residents of the city, including some well-known and prominent men, who had adopted the Stars and Stripes and the Scotch organizations, St. Andrew's Society and Caledonian Club. On the left were the Bingers' and Stevedores' Union, a body of fine looking men, the Ship Carpenters' and Caulkers' Union, and the Longshore Lumbermen's Protective Union, the members of each of them wore the badges of their respective organizations.

Next in line in this division came the Ships Officers', another body of fine looking men, under the command of Thomas Cavanagh. They had on the badge of the Association on the breast of the coat with a mourning crape and black and white ribbon.

Following the Cauliers in the order of march came the Longshore Lumbermen's Protective Association, a very strong and fine looking body of men, under the Presidency of John Conkley. They were marshaled by John Kilkary. They were dressed in plain black citizens' clothes, and had on the coat lapel on which was printed a likeness of Garfield, with the words, "Longshore Lumbermen's Protective Association."

THIRTEENTH DIVISION.

The Thirteenth Division was preceded by the Carpenters' Union, with a large banner in front in the van, and their bright uniforms were in strange but pleasing contrast with the dark military uniforms worn by the members of the Italian Bersaglieri, who followed them. The Italian Colony, Fishermen's Association, Swiss Mutual Benevolent Society, Portuguese Benevolent Society, Portuguese Protective Society, in all 500 men, marched to the solemn music of the band in military order.

FOURTEENTH DIVISION.

The Fourteenth Division was composed of the Knights of Pythias, Knights of Honor, Ancient Order of Hibernians, Druids, Jurymen and Teamsters' Union, Iron Workers' Benevolent Society, and the Camella Social Club.

FIFTEENTH DIVISION.

The Commercial Union and the Fifteenth Division, which was composed wholly of our French citizens, Raphael Weill acting as Marshal. The French Zouaves in their natty uniforms, the Lafayette Guard, as representatives of the "Republique Francaise," and the French colony and French residents, showed the respect due to the memory of the late President, in the solemn and funeral way in which they marched.

SIXTEENTH DIVISION.

The Sixteenth Division was marshalled by Wm. Herlihy. The division was composed of the Society of California Pioneers, Territorial Pioneers, Native Sons of the Golden West, and Pacific Stock and Exchange Board.

SEVENTEENTH DIVISION.

The Seventeenth Division was composed as follows: Hand & Prompt Fire Company; San Francisco Fire Department, David Scannell, Chief. An escort Veterans of the Mexican War, John L. Durkee acted as Marshal of the Exempt Fire Company.

EIGHTEENTH DIVISION.

The Eighteenth Division was composed of the following organizations, led by the Florida Band: Scandinavian Society, Sclavonic Hlyric M. B. Society, Eureka Benevolent Society, Swedish Society. The Division was marshalled by John Simpson. The Societies, as far as possible, were dressed in the Scandinavian dress. All were decorated lavishly clothed in mourning and showed the customary tokens in the way of crayed badges, sashes, etc.

AT THE PAVILION.

The solemn occasion was brought to a close by literary, musical and religious exercises at the Pavilion, which was filled to overflowing by a large number of ladies and the public in general, but the greater part of those who took part in the procession, did not enter the edifice, but dispersed on their homes after that point was reached.

REV. CLERGY IN THE PROCESSION.

Among the Rev. Clergy who took part in the procession we noticed Rev. Father Brinkin of St. Patrick; Rev. Father Cullen and Rev. P. Brady of St. John's; Rev. Fathers P. McMurray, K. Gallagher, Rev. Father Scott of St. Mary's, Rev. Joseph A. Gallagher and Rev. P. R. Lynch of St. Joseph's.

PASTORAL LETTER FROM ARCHBISHOP ALEMANY.

The following is a copy of a pastoral letter issued Friday by His Grace Archbishop Alemany to the clergy of the archdiocese:

REV. DEAR SIR: The public calamity which has fallen on our country, all the more deeply felt in mourning at the sad death of our President, demands some humble acknowledgment to the Almighty. Please, therefore, announce from the pulpit next Sunday and the following Tuesday, Monday be kept as a day of mourning and supplication, and which should take the shape of as urgently recommended, that on that day a High Mass be celebrated for the repose of the Nation (Missa pro pace seu pro necessitate sanctæ Ecclesiæ), during which the Dies Irae will not occur, the solemn Mass may better be celebrated at such time as the people shall enable all that can to attend the funeral procession announced to take place on that day.

Let the people and all raise their hearts to the Omnipotent Ruler of all Nations, that He may direct the counsels of our Government, and fill the hearts of all with sincere sentiments of loyalty to the truth as taught by Christ, and the blessings of true happiness and prosperity. Your devoted brother in Christ,

✠ JOSEPH S. ALEMANY,
ARCHBISHOP OF SAN FRANCISCO.

SAN FRANCISCO, September 23d, 1881.

SERVICES IN THE CATHOLIC CHURCHES.

In accordance with the Letter of Archbishop Alemany, Masses were celebrated in all the Catholic churches throughout the Archdiocese on Monday last for the welfare of our Republic. At St. Mary's Cathedral a large congregation assembled at the celebration of Solemn High Mass, the ceremonies being unusually impressive and the music of rare merit. The ceremonies were conducted by Rev. Peter Louth, late of Ireland, assisted by Rev. Father Kelly of St. Ignatius, corner Van Ness Avenue and Hayes street. Mons. Jos. Sadoupey officiated as Priest, or Solemn High Mass such as is only held upon special occasions, was celebrated by Father Mouesa.

Father Kenna, who delivered a brief but impressive sermon, spoke forcibly and eloquently. He said: "On the very anniversary of the day Chief Magistrate of our country was stricken down unto death, and just performed the last valiantly struggled for life and we hoped against hope and against the medical skill of the world we had anticipated the end, our sorrow was greater than if he had died when the bullet first struck him. We had not had time to realize our real President has shown him a solid North American, rushing on a par with the most exalted nation moures about his bier, and would to God that only we could do so, but we do so because he who held to us God's place in civil government, and God's place in government was the body of our dead President—we must ask our God to forgive us—we must pray to the last thirty years there has scarcely been a ruler who has done so much for his country as our President. What are the causes? I have not time to discuss them, but I feel it my duty to warn you of danger for the future, in the disrespect which prevails in some quarters for the Sabbath day. Unless that children will and obey their parents, and the Industrial school, the Community has instituted, the overwhelming with children who have no respect for parental authority.

The reason for this exists that the practical infidelity of parents, who are the cause of children who pretend to believe there is a real manifest in all their acts to their subjects. Another principal cause is the false idea of the source of authority. Our Republic is a model, a great example, and preferred that we rule through them as our representatives. It is a government of the people, and the authority there will does not come from us, but from God. There is a great danger in this, and we must go to the root to save the tree—we must teach the fundamental principles of our government and liberty. It is the children. The children are the hope of our country, and we must teach them their duties to God and to their country. Let us give them good principals and teach them obedience to God and to their country, and to those whom fall on mature taught his children at home, in public schools, and in the school of parental love and care he has left. In the Catholic schools the Church is doing its duty by children. He knows that in raising them to be good citizens and good Christians they are the highest duty by the Government. It was said that the early days that everyone who planted a tree was a public benefactor. He who plants a child and has taken care of it is a public benefactor. The man who occupies the Presidential chair is one who we can obedience and respect. When the bullet struck Garfield the Vice President did not occupy an enviable position. He appeared in the eyes of the world as a President, during eighty days the eyes of fifty millions of people were upon him, and he failed. Shall we be faithless? he has come out of the ordeal pure gold. Shall we be faithless? I believe not. I believe we have won a great President in his successor in whom we can safely trust the honor, glory and dignity of this great country.

RESOLUTIONS OF CONDOLENCE.

T. IGNATIUS COLLEGE.

Resolutions Adopted at a Meeting of Its Societies.

A few hours after the announcement of the death of our lamented President, James A. Garfield, the officers and members of all the religious and literary societies of St Ignatius' College held a meeting to express their sorrow at the sad event.

The meeting was called to order by Rev. Father Brinkin, S. J., Rev. Jos. M. Neri was then elected presiding officer, and Mr. John F. Hooker, Secretary, all the members of the meeting being of the various societies acting as Vice-Presidents.

The following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

WHEREAS, The Chief Magistrate, Civil institution and representative for the rightful and legal government of our people, by the choice of their suffrages, a faithful and able officer, the worthy object of their deep respect, affectionate feelings, and well founded hopes and fond wishes, their best and greatest friend, statesman, manly and upright, talented and sincere, active and prudent, high minded, religious, devoted to his family, and to his country and his God, the President of the United States of North America, ranking on a par with the most exalted sovereigns of the world, stricken by the daring and cowardly hand of a disappointed office seeker, and conscious suffering, borne with heroic patience and fortitude, and patiently suffering for weeks distressing aids to his afflicted family and his loving country, and finally succumbed, after trying vicissitudes of cheering hope and depressing anxiety, finally succumbed to a wonderfully sustained but too unequal struggle, and has been taken away from this world by a sudden death, and has passed into the regions of eternity. To the universal wail and cry, rising from every quarter of the civilized world in unison with the deep lamentations of a disconsolate people, we also, the officers and members of the different religious and literary societies of St. Ignatius College, with to join our fervent but sincere sorrowing voices to express our sympathy and respect for the illustrious departed, our admiration for the upright character of a great and good man, snatched too soon from our midst and our heartfelt interest for those whom he loved and cherished; we do therefore unanimously resolve

First—That, recognizing the hand of God Almighty to all terrestrial events, whether great or small, pleasure or pain, we bow humbly beneath the supreme will of the Universal Ruler of nations and countries, the Lord God of heaven and earth; and while we deeply mourn the untimely loss of our Chief Magistrate in a great and irreparable calamity, and a just cause of deep affliction to the people of the whole country, we, in our heartfelt grief, submit to the inscrutable dispensations of His Providence, which has allowed the heavy blow to fall upon us for His secret but ever benevolent designs, for those who trust in Him.

Second—That we execrate with all the strength of our hearts the irreligious, nefarious, revolutionary principles and sentiments which so frequently somewhere incite wicked and detestable men to raise their murderous hands against their fellow men, and still more execrable, when invested with power, thus sapping the very foundations of civil and religious society—and we admire at the sometime the noble fortitude with which the immortal victim of the horrifying crime so well lived so unmerited end.

Third—That we feelingly sympathize with a truly faithful and heroic wife, who, too cruelly assailed from a most loving and worthy husband, whose precious life her extraordinary attentions and devoted cares have lengthened for a time prolonged. We sympathize with the aged, bereaved father, and the orphaned children, the whole country, who now in our friendship, all shed one common tear of sorrow, and a crime, not only against the laws of humanity, against God and Nature, but against the United States and Nation.

Fourth—That we offer as our earnest prayers and express our ardent desire that Divine Almighty may remove the hand of chastisement and affliction from this cherished land, and bless it with prosperity, but above all, with just, honest rulers and worthy representatives of the People, who alone are worthy of the dignity of God, which is conferred upon them.

Fifth—That the present resolutions and sentiments be given for publication to some of the Public Journals, and that a copy be also be transmitted by the Chairman of this meeting to the most esteemed widow of our late President, James A. Garfield, and a copy be also placed in the archives of each of the societies here assembled.

IRISH NATIONAL LAND LEAGUE.

A mass meeting of the Irish National and Independent Land League was held Sunday afternoon at Irish American Hall, D. J. Tooby in the chair. The Chairman stated that the meeting was called to take action in regard to the funeral notice of the day. The Rev. Father Ardia, accompanied by Judge Conroy as aide in the eleventh division (Irish Catholic Societies), Sheerin, Hughes, McCormick, Gibbons, Kavanaugh, O'Donohue, O'Brien, Conroy, McDermott, Hogan, Mooney, McKeague, Reardon and Mohan. The following is the ceremonial being unusually impressive badge: McAbe, Warland O'Brien. The following resolutions were adopted:

The Irish National Land League of California has received with heartfelt sorrow the news announcing the sad intelligence that our late beloved President of the United States, James A. Garfield, departed this life at Long Branch, New Jersey, on the 19th inst., after a heroic and painful struggle. We feel that in his death we have lost one of the prayers and sympathy of the whole land. We condemn the iniquitous assassin as the chosen Executive of a free people and highest representative of a great republican Government, as a man whose genius and virtue adorned the exalted station to which he was summoned by the voice of the Republic. In life, solid, practical, commonsense, and a true patriot will, he became the trusted counsellor, a stalwart and powerful champion of the noble and sublimer powers than all the sway of imperial dominion. We cannot but feel that James A. Garfield's office was reflected from the character of his past. In and above the Presidential dignity were ever to be found the man, the husband, the friendly neighbor, the obedient son, the loyal friend, and, higher than all of a class, the instinct Christian, meekly depending upon Omnipotence, and in the hour of adversity, he was Therefore be it

Resolved, That, sharing in the universal sorrow of the American people and the grief of all the friends of humanity, we do hereby express our deep and heartfelt sympathy with the bereaved widow, and the children of our lamented President.

Resolved, That we denounce the wickedness of the overall wretch whose evil mind prompted this fiendish act, and

Resolved, That this organization will participate in the solemn funeral obsequies, and invite all our fellow citizens without distinction, and especially Irishmen and their friends, to assist us in honoring the memory of our deceased President.

The meeting then adjourned.

ST. PATRICK'S MUTUAL ALLIANCE.

At a joint meeting of St. Patrick's Alliance, Island San Francisco, No 2, held at Charter Oak Hall, on the evening of September 25, 1881, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

WHEREAS, It has pleased Almighty God in His divine wisdom to call from this world our beloved President, James A. Garfield, the Chief Magistrate of the people, and a true Catholic, and a faithful friend of the ancient; and, whereas, we desire to give expression to our sorrow at the loss of our patriotic and faithful friend, and

Farm and Home.

Don't Put Pins in Your Mouth.

Tuesday afternoon a young woman applied to Dr. Mayer of Hartford, Ct., for an examination of her throat, which pained her. So far as the examination went, nothing could be discovered, and giving her a bottle of liniment she was recommended to rub her throat with it. But she returned, feeling sure "something was sticking in her throat." The doctor first tried reaching far down with one hand, and finding nothing, he tried with the other. At a depth d. wn the throat beyond all reasonable probability of reach by hand, he felt a pin firmly sticking in the throat—not evasive, but laughtable, and too firmly imbedded to be extracted without instrumental aid. With his forceps he got hold of it, and had to bend it sharply—of course with great pain to the young woman—before it could be pulled out. In head was imbedded in the back part of the gullet, and the point was deeply fixed in the throat below the larynx. The sufferer almost went into hysteria—the joy over the relief, on seeing the pin pulled out, overcoming all her suffering.

The Mistakes of Mothers.

Thousands of mothers slave, grow prematurely old, forget and neglect their own accomplishments, and drag themselves about as mere appendages, something between a nurse and a housekeeper to a daughter too young to realize or appreciate the sacrifices made for her. It is every person's business to make morally, mentally, physically all of themselves possible, and this settling down at thirty-five and forty into an old woman and taking a back seat that the daughters may shine is a mistake, and defeats the very end sought. There's often altogether too much done for children, and the chief result is that of making them helpless, dependent creatures. Mothers to-day are saying: "I don't care for myself now, so that Effie or Nettie get their full quota of accomplishments," when, if that mother went on building herself up on the basis of her own matured experience, and ceased to sink and absorb herself so completely in Effie and Nettie, the world with which she came in contact might be profited. Society needs matured women as live, potent factors, and the shining should not be left entirely to fledglings. Were there time and space a word would be said here in this matter for the old man, too, though he is more apt to take care of himself.

Whipping Children.

A parent who cannot govern a child without whipping it ought to surrender the care of that child to some wiser person. Sportsmen once thought it necessary to lash their dogs to getting them ready for the field. They know now that the whip should never be used. Horsemen once thought it was necessary to whip colts to teach them to start at the word and pull steadily. They know now that an apple is better than a lash and a caress is better than a blow. If dogs and horses can be thus educated without punishment, what is it in our children that makes it necessary to slap and pound them? Have they less intelligence? Have their colder hearts? Are they any lower in the scale of being? We have heard many old people say: "If we were to bring up another child we should never whip it." They are wise but a little too late. Instead of God doing so little for children that they must be whipped to goodness, He has done so much for them that even a whipping can't ruin them—that is, as a rule. But alas, there are many exceptions to this rule. Many children are of such quality that a blow makes them cowardly, or reckless, or deceitful, or permanently ugly in temper. Whipping makes children lie. Whipping makes them hate their parents. Whipping makes home unpleasant—makes boys run away, makes girls seek happiness anywhere and anyhow. Whipping is barbarous. Don't whip.

Medical Use of Eggs.

For burns and scalds there is nothing more soothing than the white of an egg, which may be poured over the wound. It is softer as a varnish for a burn than collodion, and being always on hand can be applied immediately. It is also more cooling than the "sweet oil of cotton," which was formerly supposed to be the surest application to allay the smarting pain. It is the contact with the air which gives the extreme discomfort experienced from ordinary accidents of this kind; and anything which excludes the air and prevents inflammation is the thing to be at once applied. The egg is also considered one of the best remedies for dysentery. Beaten up lightly, with or without sugar, and swallowed as a gulp, it tends by its emollient qualities to lessen the inflammation of the stomach and intestines, and by forming a transparent coating on those organs, to enable nature to assume the healthful away over the diseased body. Two, or at most three eggs per day would be all that would be necessary in ordinary cases, and since it is not merely medicine, but food as well, the lighter the diet otherwise, and the quicker the patient is kept, the more certain and rapid is the recovery.

Childrens' Laughter.

There are no sounds so sweet to a mother's ear, except perhaps the first lisping of an infant's prayer. Childrens' laughter! How dull is the home wherein its music cries so joyously school, but is near heard no more. How still is the house where the little ones are all fast asleep, their pattering feet are silent. How easily the fun of a child bubbles forth. Take even those poor, prematurely aged little ones, bred in the gutter, cramped in unsanitary homes, and ill used, it may be by drunken parents, and you will find that the child nature is not crushed entirely out of them. They are children still, albeit they look haggard and wan. Try to excite their mirthfulness, and ere long a laugh rings out as wild and free as if there was no such thing as sorrow in the world. Let the little ones laugh, then; too soon, alas! they will full cause enough to weep. Do not try to silence them, but let their gleefulness ring out in gladsome peal, and reminding us of the days when we, too, could laugh without a sigh.

"Summer Complaint."

For diarrhea, dysentery, bloody-flux, cramps in stomach, and colic, whether affecting adults, children, or infants, Dr. Pierce's Compound Extract of Smart-Weed is a sovereign remedy. It is compounded from the best French brandy, Jamaica ginger, smart-weed, or water-pepper, anodyne, soothing and healing gums. Sold by druggists.

Family Fun.

Playing the Devil.

We were a good deal amused at an anecdote we heard the other day of a certain preacher, whose calling confined him within the limits of old Kentucky. He had preached in his parish many years, ran rather short of the eloquence so much needed to keep his parishioners awake and astonished. Let him preach ever so well it made no difference—they had got used to him and used to sleeping, and there they would, to his great annoyance.

At last he hit upon an expedient to bring em all up standing, as the saying is. He procured a small tin whistle, which he took with him to the pulpit, and after taking his text and "blazing away" till his lungs were sore, and his hearers all comfortably dozing and nodding approval to each other, he suddenly drew it forth and gave a shrill toot-a-too! In an instant the whole congregation was awake and upon their feet, staring at each other, and wondering what in the name of pickles and human nature, as Sam Slick says, was to come next.

"You're a set of smart specimens of humanity, ain't you!" said the divine whistler, as he slowly gazed around on the astonished assemblage. "When I preach the Gospel to you, you all go to sleep; but the moment I go to play the devil you're wide awake, up and coming, like a rush of hornets with a pole in their nest."

Waxing 'Em.

Many of the first settlers in Illinois were rude in speech and roughin manner. Money was scarce with them, and service was paid for in produce. Gov. R— used to illustrate from incidents of frontier life by the following anecdote:

One day there came into his office a young man, accompanied by a young woman.

"Be you the 'squire!" asked the manly youth.

"Yes, sir."

"Can you tie the knot for us, right away?"

"I am ready."

"How much do you charge?"

"One dollar is the legal fee, sir."

"Will you take your fee in beeswax?"

"Yes, if you can't pay cash."

"Well, go ahead and tie the knot, and I'll fetch the wax."

"No," said the squire, thinking there was a good chance for a little fun, "bring in the beeswax first, and then I'll marry you."

Reluctantly the youth went out to where was hitched the horse, upon which, Darby and Joan fashion, they had ridden, and brought the beeswax in a sack. On being weighed its value was found to be only sixty cents.

"Well," said the anxious groom, "tie the knot, and I'll fetch some more next week."

"No, sir, I don't trust; that is against the rules of this office."

Slowly the disappointed youth turned to go out, saying, "Come Sal, let's go."

"I say, Mister," answered Sal, with a woman's wit, "can't you marry us as far as the wax will go?"

"Yes, I was and will," replied the squire, laughing, and he did.

A Good Joke.

"Pardon me for troubling you, sir, but did you ever drop a twenty dollar gold piece?" asked a man with an earnest look on his face and a memorandum book in his hand, of a well-dressed individual on the corner of Jefferson and Woodward avenues.

The man thus addressed ran his hand nervously into his various pockets, and replied:

"Well, now, I declare! Can it be possible that I same cashless as to drop that coin! You'll know it, I suppose, by my saying that it was given me by my sweetheart when I was a boy, and that it has a hole in it. Well, I do declare! Can it be possible I have lost that coin? Young man, I would rather give—"

"Thank you, sir, I have it. I picked it up when I came out of the house, and I knew it was yours because I knew you had lost it. Here it is, and I'm glad I can return it to you."

"Young man, what is your name? I want to—"

"Oh, never mind, I don't care to be known in this matter. Good morning, sir."

"Young man, I shall never rest until I know your name. Here, I'll write my name and address on a card, and if you ever—"

"Oh, I don't care for that, either. I'm in the employ of Mr. Blank, and I'm sure he will vouch for my honesty. Good morning, sir."

"Young man, I—"

"Good morning, sir. I'm in a hurry."

"Young man, I—"

"Good morning, sir."

"Young man, I—"

"Good—"

"Young man, I—"

"Good—"

"Young man, I—"

"Good—"

OUR SACRAMENTO LETTER

Sights at the State Fair—The Presidential Parade—Father McNally's Address, etc.

SACRAMENTO, California, Sept. 26, 1881.

EDITOR OF THE MONITOR:

If we judge of the State Fair by the number of visitors who thronged everywhere to see and hear what was going on, it was a decided success. There is the usual crooker, of course, saying this and that about the management, but it is always easier to find fault than to make feasible suggestions. The Pavilion certainly is not large enough, but there will doubtless be more space next year.

THE ART GALLERY

Seemed to be a favorite place with visitors; there were rows of chairs to sit upon, and the air was fresh and cool. The gallery was really a very fine perch, which was utilized, and the pictures hung on either side. One of the best pictures was "The Dress Parade," by Hunt of New York owned by Irving Scott of San Francisco. It represents some street boys playing soldiers. It is finely finished as a photograph; the face of each boy is a study by itself. H. G. Hubbridge exhibited a painting of Mt. Shasta, but it is not his best picture, by any means. Virgil William's had some Italian figures. Mr. Williams lost the head of the School of Design of San Francisco, and he will prove both on the coast and in the East. Four pictures by Thomas Hill were shown, of which "Yosemite Lake" is especially fine. Scott Bush had a large number on exhibition, most of them tropical scenes, in the style which is familiar to all who have seen any of his pictures. "The Redwoods of Austin Creek," however, is a new departure from his usual style, the cool dark green and brown being in direct contrast to the vermilion and chrome yellow which he generally uses so freely. Narjot, Chesnatcvka, Hahn, L. P. Latimer, Nahl and A. F. Hill are represented. Of the latter, the "Mission of Santa Clara in 1849" is the best. It represents the adobe church and the long low buildings, with their red-tiled roofs, and the sunny hills sky above them. H. W. McDonald and Mrs. Greenawe show some creditable water-color pieces, and there were some landscapes in black and white all, by Alma Woodlock. Many others were shown, but it would take too long to name them.

THE ENTOMOLOGICAL DISPLAY

Was one of the most interesting as well as instructive. Californians, especially, ought to be interested in this subject, since the fruit-growing interest is such an important one. Mr. Matthew Cooke has studied the subject thoroughly, and is probably better informed on the subject than any man in the State. He has written a book of about ninety pages, giving a description of the insect pests, their habits, and his plan for getting rid of them. Ten thousand copies are to be published at the expense of the State and distributed gratuitously to farmers. He had a very complete collection of specimens of the insects, in all the various stages of their existence, which prey upon the fruits, trees and vines of the State. They were shown with the aid of powerful microscopes and magnifying glasses, together with "examples of their work," roots, branches and leaves which had been eaten. There was the codling moth, with specimens of the egg, larva, pupa and perfect insect. Twenty-two species of the scale insect in all its forms, red spiders, caterpillars, pear slugs, saw flies, etc. His style is quite concentrated; he seems to have been most effectual in destroying these pests. The collection of vine pests, phylloxera, vine caepillars, etc., was in charge of Mr. Wheeler of the State Board of Viticultural Commissioners. He had also a collection of insects called "friends to the fruit-growers," because they prey upon the pests. It is fabulous lady bugs, lace wing flies, etc. Mr. Cooke told us that thousands of cocoons which kill the pests every time, but sometimes it would kill the plant too, and he thought fertilizers, as bone dust, to be preferred.

THE SLOTTER PRIZE.

For the best loaf of bread made by a young girl, was awarded to Miss Clara A. Murphy, of Brighton, Sacramento county. All the young gentlemen will probably be seeking introductions to her, for she will be sure to make a good housekeeper.

Every evening during the week there was a perfect stream at the Pavilion. The very excellent music by the band and the hum of talk and laughter was made one feel "that exhilaration that slight spasm of excitement which sets the pulses in a delightful tumult whenever people come together in a mass." Monday people came in great and moving slowly through the long hall, we observed that in the main aisle, in long sunbeams spaces, were fine displays of carpets, chandeliers, gas fixtures, clocks, sewing-machines, pianos, soap (with arches, tessellated floor and columns all of soap). On the west was arranged an interesting collection of curios, antiquities, etc., most powdered and Japanese bronzes. The east side was filled with a fine display of hardware and mows and reapers, stoves, organs and pianos. The large east hall was filled with glass cases, in which were wrought silk, satin, lace goods and millinery, exhibited by Sacramento manufacturers; also embroidery and lace work done by ladies. The central space was occupied by a fine display of elegant parlor and hall furniture, brilliant chandeliers and gas fixtures, and tall glass cases containing silk embroideries and fine goods of every description. In the three large halls were arranged various improved kinds of kitchen furniture, machinery, fine rows of tables covered with all kinds of fruit, grain and vegetables. I saw some sugar beets, each of which was as large as a three-year old child. The conservatory opened from this floor; it was small, but beautifully arranged. And on this floor Mr. Cooke had his exhibit, which was constantly surrounded by a crowd eager to learn something about "bugology."

It was positively surprising to see what an immense throng attended the races every day. The rain of Thursday was rather dispiriting, but Friday and Saturday the entire amphitheater was filled with well-dressed, comfortable, satisfied-looking people, many with their little ones and their lunch baskets. From every you see heard regret for the death of the President, and sympathy for his bereaved wife, so lately the "first lady in the land," now a desolate widow.

And so the week wind by. On Sunday the

REV. FATHER WIGAN

Celebrated High Mass, at the conclusion of which Rev. Father Grace introduced Father McNally, who is here to solicit funds to aid in building a new cathedral in San Francisco. He made a brief but eloquent address. He will doubtless meet with good success here.

Today, the day of the funeral of our martyred President, Sacramento rose as one man to do honor to his memory. All the citizens, the State officers, the lodges, societies and military, the Catholic, Protestant and Jewish clergy united in a great procession, the bands playing funeral dirges, as with measured step they marched through the streets to the Capitol. The magnificent catafalque was drawn by eight black horses, and led by a groom wearing a badge of mourning. Arrived at the Capitol grounds, the vast crowd stood patiently for hours to hear the addresses of the various ministers who had been invited to speak. The Catholic clergy was represented by the Rev. Father McNally of West Oakland; His eloquent and patriotic address was the first to draw any demonstration of applause from the assembled multitude.

Every store, shop and saloon was closed today, all the houses were draped in mourning, and no city in our whole country has given more heartfelt or sincere sorrow for the loss of the head of Government than has Sacramento. Vix.

Snakes as Life Destroyers.

The loss of life in India due to the ravages of venomous snakes is almost incredible. Yet Consumption, which is as silly and fatal as the deadliest Indian reptile, is allowed to stalk around thousands of people, while the victims are unconscious of its presence. Dr. R. V. Pierce's "Golden Medical Discovery" must be used to cleanse the blood of the scrofulous impurities, for tubercular consumption is only a form of scrofulous disease. "Golden Medical Discovery" is a sovereign remedy for all forms of scrofulous disease, "king's evil, such as tumors, white swellings, fever sores, scrofulous sore-eyes, as well as for other blood and skin diseases. By druggists.

DEATH OF A NOTABLE CATHOLIC LADY

Died in Santa Cruz on the 17th inst. at the residence of her brother, Wm. F. White (Judge R. White, in many respects a remarkable woman and one of a remarkable family of seven sisters, none of whom ever married, and all of whom were distinguished for high scholastic and literary attainments. Of the seven sisters five entered convents and of the remaining two Mary A. White died in her 23rd year, while Mary E. Mrs. Hartnett, in her final profession, takes on the 7th of this month and is buried in the graveyard of the church of the Franciscans, at the southern end of a romantic lake in the beautiful Pajaro Valley. If a life characterized by the practice of every virtue and beautiful by deeds of charity and kindness to all, a disposition whose exercise was every heart, and a humanity and of the Pharisees, can insure happiness hereafter, then may we safely say that Mary White has been rewarded and is happy. And so when the hundreds of loving friends were performing the last sad office and ere the grave had closed to hide forever from view the casket that contained the mortal form of her who was loved and respected by each individual of the concourse that attended the funeral, it was fitting that the aged Superior of the Franciscan should refer in moving terms to the many virtues of the deceased. He pointed to the church which she assisted so materially to found, as a witness of her zeal and liberality in the cause of God, and to the casket as containing all that was mortal of one who was worthy of the emulation of those who would truly serve God. Miss White was a sister of Madame Katherine White, of the Convent of the Sacred Heart at Manhattanville, N. Y., a distinguished writer and linguist, since to the poet and eminent author Gerald Griffin, and sister of Judge James White, of New York. She lived in Santa Cruz nearly twenty-seven years with her brother, Hon. W. F. White. She was a lady of superior mind, and was honored and beloved by all who knew her. May the Lord have mercy on her soul.

MORE MONEY FROM MERCED.

The officers and members of the Land League Branch in Merced may well feel proud of the material aid which they have furnished in order to further the cause of the Irish Land League. There is the banner Branch of the League in this State, and in behalf of the cause in this public thanks are due to Hon. Chas. H. Minkler, President; James Lawder, Secretary; John Dwyer, Treasurer, and the members of the organization in Merced. Following is the latest contribution from this wakeful and zealous organization:

MERCED, Cal., September 19, 1881.

TRENCH FLEMMAN, Esq., Secretary Land League, San Francisco:

Dear Sir:—I send you this day by Wells, Fargo & Co., Two Hundred Dollars from the National Land League in Ireland. Use Hundred and Eighty dollars of this amount to the proceeds of the banquet got up by the Ladies of this Branch for the benefit of the League and whose untiring exertions made it a grand success. The banquet was a splendid affair, in fact, more so than any expected, and what was better it better paid for its expense for the whole.

I put a letter and receipt for $80 from Mr. Egan last week, as he has been sent from Ireland through you, accept thanks for your kind representation of our Branch to our distinguished National Treasurer.

We mean to see the good fight ended in favor of the oppressed and down-trodden tenants of the old country. Yours, in behalf of the Branch, JOHN DWYER.

Treasurer Merced B. L. L.

Market Report.

Domestic Produce Market.

MONITOR OFFICE, Sept. 28, 1881.

FLOUR—Extra Extras are jobbing at $5 62½@$5 75; City Superfine, $4 75@$5 25; Interior brands, $5 87½@$6 50 for extra, and $4 50@$4 for superfine.

WHEAT—During the past week a scarcity of grain vessels have caused a great falling off in arrival, with three exceptions. Some of them were very fortunate, several getting over 41 days passage, and realizing a handsome profit on tonnage on the way home, but it is still large, and the indications now are that we shall be able, this overall year, to shine all sorts of grain, and all but a small surplus. The spot freight market is largely nominal, as there are only three ships here to work on, and these are held at 42 6d for a direct port, which is above the views of shippers. At the close, however, an American ship has been taken for Liverpool direct at 42 6s 3d, as will be seen above. Charters drawn during the week number 18 vessels, of a registered tonnage of 18,049, or 27,073 short tons, equivalent to a carrying capacity of 500,466 ctls. The charters Wheat fleet now in port has a registered tonnage of 78,502, or 118,753 short tons, equivalent to an export capacity of 2,295,466 ctls, against 26,215 tons at the same time last year. There is also 3,600 tons loading at Wilmington. The disengaged tonnage in port is limited to three vessels, of a register of 5,732, against 6,098 at the same time last year. Registered tonnage now loading for this port is 206,786, against 208,912 at the same time in 1880 and 181,302 in 1879. The average now in the Columbia River is 15,959 register, and there is 64,000 tons in the way from the foreign West, but the market rose again today, and at Chicago and New York the tendency was toward advancing prices. Of course, this firm, close strengthens the situation, and holds the shippers are, and have been for some time, compelled for the present, city to pay prices which business and business is consequently quiet. The only Freight Charters for Wheat to Cork for Ships' pilms: 81 712,000 tons and 1,000 and 850 sks do, at 42 6d; 1,000 tons and 2,000 sks do, 2 42 6d; 600 sks do, 42 6d, and 400 sks off grade, 41 6d. No. 1 is quotable at $1 70@$1 75 and No. 2 at $1 62½@$1 67½ ctl.

BARLEY—Opens quietly, but with a firm undertone. Holders are generally asking $1 40 for fine, and buyers offering $1 37½ and $1 40 have been reported. Offerings are moderate, but the demand is not as sharp as it was. Brewing, of course, meets with a steady inquiry at full figures, and brewers really pay the top of the mar. Kept for desirable lots, Coast Chevalier is also quiet after and is firm. Coast Chevalier is in fair request. Sales of 300 sks light brewing and 250 sks coast Chevalier; $1 42½, and 600 sks coast feed, $1 37½. Feed is quotable at $1 42½@$1 47½ for light, and $1 50@$1 55 for bright. Coast Chevalier, $1 50 coast do, $1 37½@$1 42½.

OATS—Continue very quiet but firm. Sales of 240 sks feed, $1 47½, good seed choice, $1 50 and $1 62½; common $1 30@$1 45; Surprise, $1 75 ctl.

CORN—White is arriving occasionally now, and is picked up as soon as it gets here. Sale to day of 475 sks large White at $1 52½. Yellow is quotable at $1 50 ⅌ ctl.

HAY—No change to report. The market is dull. Wheat, old, $10@$12; wild oats, $9@$11; volunteer and stable, $7@$10; alfalfa, $9@$10 ⅌ ton.

RYE—Sale of 300 sks coast at $1 75, and 170 sks at $1 70 ⅌ ctl.

BUCKWHEAT—Quotable at $1 50 ⅌ ctl.

STRAW—Per bale, 62½@65.

POTATOES—Are dull and weak, and, under heavy arrivals. Receipts since Saturday, 5,523 sacks. Buffy, Cow and $1 62½@$1 75; Peerless and Tomatoes, $1; River Reds, at $1; Early Rose, $1@$1; Sweets nominal at $2 ctl.

Poetry.

MY WIFE.

Long years ago I met a child,
As through the world I met,
She was the first star of my life—
The dearest and the best.
An angel child, by some strange fate,
To earth a darling denizen,
Who brought her virtues to my heart,
And left her wines in heaven.

I dreamt not that this child of love
Would mine for ever be,
That she had come to tread this world,
This weary world, with me.
But as in childhood, side by side,
We wandered day by day
The more I loved her, and the more
She seemed inclined to stay.

'Twas strange, that from that very hour
I never knew a care,
But seem'd, through some unearthly power,
A pleasant thing to bear;
And if perchance her gentle eye
Ever marked a tear in mine,
'Twas turned to smiles by her kind heart,
And treasured on its shrine.

Around my growing destiny
Her hopes all centered were,
For much I tried to make this world
A pleasant home to her;
And still within she seem'd content
To bear its rougher part,
Together with the joys she found
Whilst nestling in my heart.

And thus together hand in hand,
We tred this vale of tears;
Our youth departing, but our love
Increasing with our years.
Forgetting all that outward world,
Made of cried and sin,
But living more the world above,
And a bright world within.

The cheek that closely pressed mine,
Is faded now by years,
For she has known the care of life,
And we have wept its tears;
But God was ever kind to us,
Although the world was cold,
And we are growing happier,
As we are growing old.

There seems a brighter world in view,
A home from sorrow free,
A dwelling of eternal peace,
For my dear wife and me.
And O! the angels of my youth
So good, and very fair,
I know will take her wings again,
And be my angel there.

Literary Miscellany.

WINNING A WIFE

Through an Irish "Lord."

A STORY POUNDED ON FACT.

WRITTEN FOR THE MONITOR. BY JULIA HOLLAND.

Seven years ago an old man named James Daly lived at the base of Croagh Patrick in the county Mayo, Ireland. If you were to inquire of his nearest neighbor for James, Daly, he would tell you that he knew no such person; but if you were to ask for "Lord Bonegale," he would directly point out the narrow lane that led to his cabin. When and how he received the title of "Lord Bonegale" is a mystery never developed by the village gossips, but undoubtedly he had seen better days, as the Irishman never forgets good breeding, even with choice and classic literature, standing against the rough cabin wall, would seem to attest.

For many years Lord Bonegale and his son lived in the mountain cabin, the old man spending most of his time instructing his boy, and the boy was an apt scholar, as well as obedient and respectful to his aged parent. Their only means of support was a patch of ground, enclosed by furze bushes, and two goats which supplied them with milk. When hunting season came round the huntsmen would hire young Daly to carry their game, and by this means he earned sufficient money to buy clothes for himself and father; and in this manner they lived until the younger Daly was twenty-two years old.

One day the old man said: "Now, James, you have lived long enough in this wretched poverty, and it is time you should put into the world to seek a fortune."

"What! Father, leave you all alone?" his son exclaimed in amazement.

"Do not fret for me, my boy, but leave me to the care of my Divine Father." And thus the old man persuaded his son to seek employment for himself.

It was a beautiful balmy day in the month of May when young Daly bid his aged parent adieu. It is August, and he has left Croagh Patrick far behind him, and as it vanished in the twilight, the tears rolled down his cheeks—but we must not blame him for this weakness, for he must have a cold, callous heart, that could leave his native land and the scenes of his childhood without evincing emotion.

After traveling several days he reached the city of Dublin, tired and footsore. From thence he was obliged to take a deck passage on the steamer to Liverpool, as his purse was too light for any better accommodation; and a miserable passage it was upon deck with the cattle.

Arriving in Liverpool, with only two shillings in his pocket, he wandered around the city for two days, but could not get anything to do, so the third day he bought himself to the country, with the hope of getting work from a farmer. He traveled all day, stopping at every farmhouse, with no better success than in the city, and was about to give up in despair, when he came in sight of a splendid mansion.

As he approached the gate an elderly gentleman and a beautiful young lady came out. James Daly raised his hat with the ease and grace of a man who had moved in polished society, and asked the old gentleman if he would give him anything to do. "For," said he, "I have traveled for the last three days without finding employment."

"Do you understand the care of horses?" the old gentleman inquired.

"Well, no sir;" replied the tired traveler, "but I could soon learn."

"Well, my hostler is going to leave, so you may stay, and, if in a week I find you trustworthy and obedient, I shall hire you."

Now we will give our readers a little of this old gentleman's pedigree. His name was plain John Briggs, and no aristocratic blue blood flowed in his veins. His grandfather and father before himself having been soap and candle manufacturers. His father accumulated great wealth in the business and lived as only a miser could live. When the Old miser died his son came into possession of the fortune and tried to make amends for his father's parsimony by making a great display of his wealth. The beautiful young lady that we have seen was his only child, and the greatest ambition of his life was to have her marry a duke, a lord, or some scion of nobility, but she was a good sensible girl and did not inherit any of her father's vanity.

A week passed by, and old John Briggs having formed a good opinion of young Daly, hired him. They worked as friends for a year; then he was promoted to coachman. Vain old Briggs thought this handsome young man would be easily ensnared upon his coach, and felt proud when he saw the manner in which he drove his splendid team.

All this time young Daly had not forgotten his old father in Ireland, but sent him every shilling that he could spare from his wages.

Another year went by, and Daly still continued coachman; but if John Briggs knew in what estimation his daughter held their good-looking coachman, it would not be long before Daly would receive his discharge. Miss Briggs knew it would be useless to let her father know of her affection for the young coachman, as if she told him, she knew her lover would be forever driven from her sight. Not one word or look did she betray herself, and all the while the old man was happy thinking that some day his beautiful daughter would marry a title, and thus lift the Briggs's among the British aristocracy.

One day Miss Briggs was doing some shopping in Liverpool; the old man was leaning back in his carriage waiting for her, and James Daly was in his accustomed place upon the outside of the coach, when she should come up but Dennis Ryan, a young man from Daly's own neighborhood, who came also to England to seek his fortune. The young men were most happy to meet each other, and after a hearty shake hands Daly inquired about home and his father.

"His lordship is quite well," replied Ryan.

At the word "lordship" the old man in the carriage pricked up his ears and could not suppress an exclamation of surprise at it gave him to think that his coachman was a lord's son.

Poor Dennis Ryan thought it made Briggs angry because he was standing so near his coach, so he said to Daly: "I will see you another time, Jim."

As soon as they reached home Briggs told his daughter he wished to see her in the library for a few moments.

"My dear Maria," said he, "when they were seated, "I have made a wonderful discovery; our coachman is a lord's son."

"Why, father, you astonish me! Why should a lord's son have to tramp around the country as you know he did?" his daughter replied.

"He might have had some misunderstanding with his father; however, I shall make some inquiries about this young man, and, Maria, do not intimate that you know anything about it, and we shall make our inquiries in a private way."

As soon as Maria had an opportunity she went to James Daly and related all she had heard and asked him if he was really a lord's son.

"No, Miss Maria," said James smiling, "but I am the son of an old man, who has nothing in the world to leave me but an honest, unstained name, and I am more proud of that than if he left me boundless wealth gained by dishonesty."

"But why did your father say 'his lordship' to you in conversation the other day?"

"Well, Miss Maria, in some neighborhoods they call my father 'Lord Bonegale,' and every one knows him by that title better than by his real name; but he has no claim to it, as any other aristocratic title, only plain James Daly."

The next day Briggs sent for his financial agent and they had a long confidential conversation in the library, which was overheard by Maria, who was seated, unperceived, in one of the large bay windows. The purport of Mr. Briggs's conference was to send the agent to Ireland to make inquiries concerning young Daly, in order to discover if he were indeed the son of an Irish lord.

As soon as Briggs and his agent left the room Maria glided out and met the agent in the garden, and asked him if he were going to Ireland upon business for her father.

"Yes, Miss Maria," he concisely replied.

She gave a low merry laugh and said: "I know all about that business. Now, Mr. Thompson, do you value my friendship any?"

"Indeed, Miss Maria, I value your friendship very much."

"Very well, then, you will not betray anything I tell you to my father. You know, as well as I do, how whimsical my father is, and how very absurd it is of him to send you to Ireland to seek his nephew, James Daly is the son of a poor man, to whom some wag has given the title of lord."

"Never mind, Miss Maria, it will make all right with your father and not compromise you in the least."

When Mr. Thompson was ready to start for Ireland he went to James Daly and said: "James, I am going to Ireland in a few weeks, and if you have any message to send your father, I will be most happy to deliver it."

James gave him two pounds sterling, which he had saved from his wages, to give to his father. But, as the reader already surmises, this was only a ruse Mr. Thompson took in order to find where Daly's father lived. Mr. Thompson went to Ireland, not to find out whether James's father was a lord or not, but to honor old Briggs and as his expenses were paid, what better occasion could he take to have a holiday and view the enchanting scenery of the Emerald Isle.

John Briggs was so sure that James was a lord's son that he had not waited for his return, but sent for James to meet him in the library, and said:—

"James, I am pleased with the manner in which you fill your present menial position, and I desire to show you my gratitude by promoting you. I have wished for a long time to find a good reliable young man to act as my private secretary, and I think you will suit me very well if you accept the position."

"Mr. Briggs," replied James, as his heart palpitated with joy at the announcement, "since you place such confidence in me, I will gladly accept the position offered. I trust, my conduct will prove that your confidence was not misplaced."

We need not tell our readers that when Maria Briggs heard of the event she was delighted. Here was the horrible choice of her heart elevated to the dignity of private secretary to her father, while James Daly blessed his old father for the care he had taken to educate him, for now, indeed, it proved useful in promoting his success in life.

When Mr. Thompson returned he related to his employer a close towards Croagh Patrick, and saw, for the first time in his life, the place where the Apostle of Ireland went to fast and pray. When he reached the base of the mountain he asked an old woman, whom he chanced to meet, if she could direct him to Lord Bonegale's residence.

"Arrah, thin I can," she replied in a kiddly way, as she was none other than Dennis Ryan's mother; "an' mere's the pity it wasn't the rale lord, for its himself that would make the fine gintleman, for he has the larning as well as any gintlem, an' he made a scholar of his boy. There as the borheen that leads to his cabin."

Mr. Thompson followed the direction indicated by the old woman, and soon came in sight of the lowly residence of the "lord." Two lodge goats were thumping their horns against the side of the cabin, and an eagle was within partaking of his noon-day meal, which consisted of oat meal "stirabout" and goat's milk, for the old man's teeth were all gone and he had to partake of such food as he could masticate. He was eating his "stir-a-bout" with an iron spoon, from an iron skillet which he held on his knees, although this was not a very dignified position for an Irish lord to be in while eating his lunch.

He put down his skillet as Mr. Thompson entered, and arose to greet him, saying, in feeling tones: "You are welcome, stranger, under my humble roof."

"Have I the pleasure of addressing Mr. Daly, otherwise Lord Bonegale?" said Mr. Thompson.

"I am that humble individual, at your service, sir," the old man replied with natural dignity.

"Well, Mr. Daly, my name is Thompson. I come from England, and I have brought a message from your son."

"Ah!" exclaimed the old man, "God bless my boy! And, sir, is my son well?"

"He is well sir, and sent you this," said Thompson, handing him the two pounds sterling.

"Thanks to my boy, and to you too, sir, a thousand times for this generous gift."

Mr. Thompson continued for some time talking with the old man, in whom he began to be deeply interested, and finally noticed the bookcase and questioned Daly about it.

"That, sir," he replied, "is an heirloom in my family, and it is all the property I have to leave to my son."

"How came you to settle in this place, Mr. Daly?"

"Ah, sir, it was but a choice between the roadside and this place, and I took this, as my ancestors did of old, when Cromwell banished them from their homes. I am only one of the many victims of the cruel landlord system that prevails at present in this unvisited land, but I will not enter into details, for my story is too long and too sad to reveal to the ear of a stranger, and my sorrows are held sacred in my own breast."

"Ah, ha!" thought Mr. Thompson to himself, "here is an humble old man, who evidently has seen better days; how differ, yet his deportment from the consequence and dignity assumed by old John Briggs! So he determined not to put any obstacle in the way of the alliance between his principal's coachman and Maria Briggs.

After a few weeks, when Mr. Thompson returned to England and reported himself to "the master," he greeted him with: "Well, Thompson, did you find James' father?"

"Yes, sir; I found him," replied Mr. Thompson.

"Well," he anxiously asked, "is it true that he is an Irish lord?"

"It is true, Mr. Briggs, and the people know him by no other title. Why, my dear sir, all the money you have got could not buy his lordship's tableloge (meaning the old man's own legs), and, moreover, sir, I was somewhat awed when I approached his mansion. He keeps a body-guard (meaning his goats) and his son is his only son, in fact, his only child, and, no doubt, will inherit all his property when the old man dies, as Lord Bonegale spoke in the highest terms of his son."

"Does he know his son is working in menial service?"

"He does not know what he is doing."

"But, Thompson, what do you suppose the young man is assuming such a menial position for?"

"Well, sir, you know these noblemen's sons take queer notions sometimes, and he may be acting thus in order to gratify his taste for sweet by and by."

Briggs rubbed his hands in great glee, and said, with much fervor: "James Daly is indeed an unexceptionally fine young man."

After Mr. Thompson had left the house old Briggs called his daughter and said, with considerable emotion: "Maria, my dear, it is as I told you. Mr. Daly will be Lord Bonegale one of these days; how fortunate I have made him my private secretary."

"But you know, dear father, that he will not always remain with you if he is a lord's son," said Maria.

"But, Maria, suppose that your father's happiness would be complete if you and he should get married?"

"But suppose, father," replied the cautious maiden, that the young man should not want to marry me, as he never has shown any partiality for me."

"Remember, my child, that I have as much money as any lord in the land, and none but a man with a lordly title shall ever marry my daughter," and he strode the table with his hand to give emphasis to his determination.

"Dear father, replied the overjoyed girl, suppose Mr. Daly was possessed of all the qualities of an honorable man, would you then object, unless he had a title?"

"I would, Miss! Our family must rank in the peerage of England; that I've set my mind on."

Vain, foolish old man! It was not the qualities of too individual that he looked for, but the empty title and the bauble reputation.

Knowing the vanity that pervaded Mr. Briggs's breast, James Daly had no obstacle in his matrimonial way, so he took a favorable opportunity and asked him for the hand of his daughter. The old man was dazzled by his own fancies for the future glory of his family, so he willingly and delightedly gave his consent.

Not by any word or act did young Daly lead his future father-in-law to think that his own father was a genuine lord, so the young man must be held exempt from all blame in the transaction.

Old Briggs wanted to have a grand wedding, but the young folks insisted upon having the ceremony quiet, so they were married in the house, and started for Ireland upon their wedding tour.

After visiting the Lakes of Killarney and the romantic spots adjacent, the bridal party went to Lord Bonegale's cabin, and the old man cried with joy upon receiving his son. They took the old man with them to Dublin and bought him a new suit of clothes, consisting of velvet knee-breeches, silk stockings, silver buckles on his shoes, a braided coat, and lace and ruffles on his wrists and breast. In this garb he looked a real lord indeed, and far more aristocratic than John Briggs in all his finery.

Maria next wrote to her father telling him that her father-in-law was coming home with her to spend the summer, and that he was the nicest old gentleman in the world, and when they got home she introduced Mr. Daly as Lord Bonegale, and the two old men shook hands cordially, and John Briggs said, with considerable pride, "You have adopted a very fine son, Maria." Daly being so accustomed to hearing himself called by this title for so many years, it came to the highest notch, and he expressed his thanks by a courtly bow, betokening the rank of the highest nobility.

The fictitious Lord Bonegale behaved very well at Mr. Briggs's table, and made the silver service look as if he never had eaten an iron spoon. But he was not long in England when Briggs took sick, and he would insist upon having "his lordship" by his room and read for him every day, and he would ask him to name all the lords and lady that he was acquainted with. Daly would shake his head and say "Poor man, his mind is wandering," for he was entirely ignorant of the real nature of the business which brought Mr. Thompson to Ireland.

After lingering for some time, Mr. Briggs died, contented, thinking that some day people would call his daughter "My Lady," and he never knew that James Daly's nerves were those of an honest upright man, and not the callous of aristocratic title, which climes covers the most corrupt vices.

Mr. Thompson never regretted that he had deceived old Briggs, for young James Daly was an esteemed member of society, and he and his wife lived happily together. Although he was not a lord, except in the estimation of his wife, who often told him that they were as happy as if he had indeed a lord of the land—a legitimate "monarch of all the surveys"—and that she was in the heart of his happy and affectionate wife, whose life was far more blessed than many of the titled ladies of the land.

Progress of the Church in England Since 1850.

The official statistics of the growth of the Catholic Church in England published for the end of 1880 and of 1880 are as follows:

1850—Bishops, 8; Priests, 826; Religious Houses for men, 17; School children, 24,000; Churches and Chapels, 570. 1880—Bishops, 14; Priests, 1962; Religious Houses for Men, 134; School Children, 204,752; Churches and Chapels, 578.

At this date many missions served by a Regular were not included in this category.

This increase is larger than anything of the kind that has ever been recorded within a similar period in the history of the Church in England.

There have never been so many bishops and priests in England since the national change in religion as there are to-day.

The last survivors of the ancient Hierarchy were Lawrence Vaux, Bishop of Lincoln, and Thomas Goldwell, Bishop of Asaph. In 1559 the first was cast into prison, and, after 25 years of suffering and confinement, died in Westbeach Castle, in 1584. The other the same year went into exile and died in Rome—some say in 1581, and others in 1585. From 1559 till 1850 the Catholics in England were left for three different periods, making up 111 years in all, without the administration and government of a regular bishop. Speaking of this sad time, a Chronicler of the olden times says: "It is here to be observed that while Ireland was subject to the same civil government and suffered terrible persecutions, she always preserved her Hierarchy, her subordination, and her unity; she remained a Catholic nation, whereas England, like Saxony and Sweden, the land of her ancestors, by her policy lost these blessings and became a prey to the dominant heresy."

Since 1850 it appears that 578 churches have been built, at how great an expense it is unknown to the world, and 570 chapels as well as public elementary schools, have been erected by the munificence of the Catholic nobility and gentry, and at their sole expense. In respect to zeal for religion and generosity in its behalf, we may well compare the nobility and gentry of England, with the premier duke of the realm in their front, stand at the head of the Catholic nobility and gentry of the world. They possess relatively smaller means, they have found themselves in the midst of the greater need, and they have acted as a body with a liberality to which we know of no parallel in the country of Europe.

The immense increase in the number of priests, secular and regular, and of churches and schools cannot be attributed to any one cause alone. First, there has been an enormous increase in Catholic population, arising, not so much from conversion, as from immigration and from the natural growth of the development of the cotton trade, and reached its climax about the time of the Irish famine. A great number of conversions, however, have been made during the past years, so that it is often noticed that Catholics visit almost entire congregations in London and in the provinces which are made up of converts and their children. A considerable number of the clergy, also, are converts to the Faith. Then there has been an unprecedented Imperial commercial prosperity, which has affected all classes. Two centuries ago, the Catholics of England, were from 150,000 to 200,000 in number, now they may be reckoned at perhaps 2,250,000. If, however, thousands of educated English Protestants, and many more thousands of the middle and especially of the poorer classes have become Catholics, making a kind of sacrifice for salvation of their souls, we fear that many have been lost to the Church by mixed marriages, especially among the children of the poor, by offers of food, clothing and other temporal advantages and by the various arts of proselytism employed in public and private institutions and elsewhere. By a law of nature a minority is perpetually absorbed by the stronger and the weaker elements of the minority.

THE FISHERMAN'S RING.

The famous Fisherman's Ring used by the Pope to seal Papal Briefs and Bulls, is a steel seal made in the fashion of a Roman signet (representing Saint Peter fishing) and is not to be used for any other purpose, or has relation to religious or temporal matters. The Fisherman's Ring is said to be made upon a gold surface; in some cases it bears legends, and the seals are generally attached by stringes of silk. Impressions of this seal are also made in lak, direct upon the document on which the brief is written. During the Pontificate of Benedict XIV. (1740-1758) the figure of St. Peter upon the ring is destroyed with a file, and thereupon all the authority and acts of the late Pope pass to the College of Cardinals. When a new Pope is consecrated he receives Fisherman's Ring is presented to him by the Cardinal Chamberlain or Chamberlain.

—One of the greatest ceremonies of the Church was performed in the old Cathedral of Armagh, Ireland, recently. The first Catholic chapel ever erected there after the Reformation was solemnly blessed by the Most Rev. Dr. Power, Lord Bishop of Waterford.

THE MOTHER OF SORROWS.

A Miraculous Cure. How a Girl in Italy was Cured of Malignant Disease.

The following narrative was sent to one of the papers in Italy by the father of the young woman who was relieved of a most distressing complaint. The heart of a father, a Christian father, and, consequently, the loss of a beloved daughter of twenty years, which seemed to sore distress at the prospect of losing another of eighteen summers, is very reason to be most grateful to the Mother of Sorrows, who has changed the profound sorrow of parents into transports of holy joy. My daughter, Anna Maria, was prostrate upon what was supposed to be her death-bed, after three years of progressive and painful sufferings, and on the morning of Friday, May 20th, seemed to have entered into her last agony, so that, had it been mounted at about eight o'clock, shortly after midday the minister of God began the pathetic prayers by which the Catholic Church intimates to the Christian and recommends the soul to God, into whose hands, whether we will or no, we must all fall. When the priest came to the words, proficiscere, anima Christiana, "go forth, O Christian soul," seeing that there still remained a breath of life, he paused to await the solemn moment which would terminate her earthly career. The sick girl seemed to collect her wasted forces and rally for the moment, and asked to be left alone with her mother, Giulia Ingani, who just entered the room. Her parents retired into the adjoining chamber, but through the door could hear the anxiously watched all the movements of their dying child, who, with her face turned to her mother, spoke speaking feebly with her uncle, as though asking of him some spiritual assistance.

ITS DEPARTURE FROM THIS LIFE,

Previous to this illness, my daughter had been in the habit of reciting every evening with her mother the Litany of the Mother of Sorrowful Mother, and a Credo to Jesus of Nazareth, and then drinking some drops of holy water.

OUR LADY OF SORROWS.

This devotion, which was of great comfort to her in her sufferings, was interrupted when she was obliged by fever to take to her bed. She now reproached her uncle for the omission, lamenting that she deprived her of the consolation of that holy water. Mgr. Ingani hesitated, fearing that the sick girl, who for several days had not been able to take so much as a spoonful of broth, and who vomited whatever it was attempted to force her mouth with particles of ice, might be injured if he acceded to her request. But the importunate girl again, until finally he gave her a very minute quantity, which she wished to increase to a larger amount. I then interposed, urging Mgr. Ingani to consider the risk he ran of causing a return of the vomiting, when my daughter,

BEGINNING TO FEEL THE EFFECTS OF THE MIRACULOUS WATER,

requested him to be silent and to give her, saying that she already felt better. Moved by an impulse of faith, Mgr. Ingani gave the sick girl the little phial of holy water, and, taking down a small framed picture of the Sorrowful Virgin, before which a lamp burned, he gave her another to pray every evening, placed upon her breast, and she, pressing it closely to her heart, seemed to feel her internal organs as it were, renewed, and herself as strong as before her illness. Her mother wept. Joy. It was then that, with animated countenance and sparkling eyes, she began to relate the miracle which had just taken place, submitting to all the examinations it was desired to make to test the truth of her recovery.

"A MIRACLE"

especially when they saw the sick girl, who but a few minutes before had been in the agony, now seated on the side of the bed, able to move freely in any way; and, what was more astonishing, able to take food, to eat and drink, as she had not done for months. The parents, scarcely daring to credit their own eyes, fearing some dangerous illusion, sent at once for the doctor, who came promptly, and, seeing the unlooked for change of scene, inquired into the state of things, and examined my daughter thoroughly, substituting for all the other experiments which he mentions in his statement hereto appended. As soon as Dr. Santolamazza perceived my daughter to rise, and jumped from the bed, dressed herself without any assistance, came out of the room to the great joy of her parents and of all those persons whom the rumor of the miracle had already collected around us, went to the window and out on the balcony, that the people assembled in the street, seeing her, might give testimony of the miracle, and that those offspring are still at work. It was astonishing, indeed, to see the crowd upon whom had England the battle of Fontenoy but the English king, instead of thinking of a thing, or of a thing, or of a thing, or

WEDNESDAY..... OCTOBER 5.

Is Proselytism Practiced in Convent Schools?

In the October issue of the Pacific Churchman we find a communication falsely signed "A True Catholic," and attacking Catholic convent schools upon one or two points, which we propose to expatiate upon more fully and forcibly than may be pleasing to the Protestant lady who tries to put behind a "Popish" signature.

It is a source of great annoyance to the projectors and so-called "Faculty" of many Protestant schools—which are mere skeletons dressed up, painted and puffed to deceive the public, why it is that the "Roman" schools are so numerously patronized by Protestant parents, when their own high-sounding "Institute," or "Hall," or "Academy," is left almost tenantless, and allowed to collapse for want of children in attendance.

But to one who has studied the subject, the reasons for this seeming anomalous state of Protestant opinion is very easily explained. In the first place, moral Protestant parents desire the purity of their daughters to be preserved; hence, they send them to Catholic schools where virtue is the jewel that adorns the character of every inmate, from the scullion to the Sister Superior. Protestant parents feel full confidence that under the roof of the Catholic convent school not even the breath of vice can taint the character of the children, who are, in very many cases, far more safe from sin when under the charge of the Sisters than they would be in their own homes. The case is entirely different in the sham "seminaries" of the sectarians, which are semi-schools in more senses than one. In these "institutions" some of the teachers are gentlemen and some of them are not; hence the danger of throwing a virtuous young lady into such society, day after day, is duly appreciated by Protestant parents. In many of these Protestant schools, also, the pupils are permitted to receive billets-doux from their love-sick swains on the outside; the result is that the pupil's mental labor is devoted more to the concoction of love letters, to be surreptitiously conveyed to her swain at the trysting place, than to the attainment of any study in literature; and she leaves the school without even a smattering of knowledge, save the soft nonsense which she imbibes from reading romances, or the equally vitiating literature of the story papers.

Protestant parents are aware that no such nonsense is allowed to permeate a school under Catholic control. Hence, Protestant young ladies sometimes strongly object to attend Catholic schools, because they cannot have the "liberty" in them they were permitted in the schools presided over by the free-and-easy faculty. In Catholic schools no latitude is allowed to love-sick young ladies; they go there to study certain lessons and to acquire certain accomplishments, and if they do not attend diligently to their scholastic duties, they are unceremoniously banished, bag and baggage, out on the front gate. There is no prefence or policy about the schools in charge of Sisters. Their own reputation is at stake, and they know that they are responsible to God for the conscientious discharge of the duties they have voluntarily vowed to heaven to perform in chastity, poverty and obedience. Protestant teachers, on the other hand, employ themselves for sake of the Almighty Dollar, and, so long as their salary is paid, they do not care a cent whether the pupils are in love or in literature. They have no vows to bind them, no duties they consider sacred, no conscientious scruples to torment them—hence the "academy" is to them a kind of a go-as-you-please gymnasium which affords them a generous salary for very little labor.

In the next place, no pupil in a convent school is permitted to receive promiscuous company in the parlor. "Mashers," and all that ill-begotten breed of brassy and brainless fops, are rigidly excluded. The young ladies are never from under the supervision of the Sisters—hence, their parents receive them back again from the Sisters, fortified in virtue, accomplished in deportment, and enriched in the requirements necessary for their sex.

These, therefore, are a few of the potent reasons why Protestant parents prefer to send their daughters to Catholic schools in preference to Protestant institutions where they are permitted many liberties which we may safely designate as dangerous indulgences.

Having thus stated the difference between the system pursued in sectarian schools and in those under Catholic Religious, let us take up the letter of "A True Catholic" and note her objections, the first of which is couched in the following language:

"A great and growing evil has recently come under my observation, and as it concerns so particular parish alone, but is of widespread influence, and may affect disastrously our Church at large, I think it best to speak of it through your columns. I refer to the practice of sending Church girls into convents for education. Even granting that the advantages are great, the drawbacks surely are very considerable. One unfortunate fact ought to be sufficient of itself to prevent any mother among us from ever adopting this course. Is she aware that her daughter cannot attend the service of her own Church? (Unless she even take her Prayer Book with her into the Convent?) Either she must be deprived of public or common worship, alone her, for months at a time, or she must join in the superstitious services of the Roman communion. Which horn of this dilemma can a conscientious Churchwoman choose?"

We presume the lady who writes thus is an Episcopalian, and for her benefit we can assure her that every non-Catholic is attendance at Catholic schools is permitted—during the hours allotted to religious exercises—to read her Bible, her Prayer Book, or the Koran, if she thinks that therein she can find "the way, the truth and the life." Of course the discipline of the school demands that all should attend the same service, but the Protestant pupil is never coerced into assisting at any of the ceremonies of the Church, and we have seen the children of Protestant parents reading the Protestant Bible, Hymn or Prayer Book, during the celebration of Mass in the chapel of a convent. From this fact our "True Catholic" can be assured that Episcopalian young ladies can take the Bible, the Book of Common Prayer, and even the Church of England Catechism with them into convent schools—and no Sister will scowl at them for doing so!

This good lady, in her misdirected zeal, called the ceremonies of the Church "superstitious," but such a cant word comes with a poor grace from one who styles herself "A True Catholic;" hence, her claim to that title is annihilated, inasmuch as "A True Catholic" would not apply such a scurrilous term to the worship of 200,000,000 of Christians who form the healthy stem of the gospel tree—of which the Episcopalian sect claims to be "a branch." The lady correspondent, therefore, should be more charitable in her criticism upon ceremonies about which she is apparently very ignorant. The lady's logic is also very lame, as any intelligent person can discern from the closing paragraph in her epistle, wherein she says:

"But the Sisters undertake not to use any influence to convert the Protestant girls. In any mother silly enough really to wish her child to be, there is another dilemma for her especial benefit. If the Sisters conscientiously hold the Roman Catholic faith, then they believe that only as their pupils hold it, likewise, can they secure salvation. They ought therefore, it is their most solemn, broadest duty, to use all possible lawful influence to convert them. It follows, therefore, that, either the Sisters neglect this obligation, and so are unfaithful women, or they do use means to Romanize your daughters, and so violate their pledge to you. Which horn of this dilemma will a conscientious, devout, Church mother choose?" A TRUE CATHOLIC.

We beg to inform this lady that the sole and primary object for which Catholic schools are established is for the education of Catholic children. Proselytism is not a principle in their foundation. If the influence of the holy lives of the devoted Sisters occasionally lead a Protestant young lady into the Catholic Church, it is done through the grace of God acting on the soul of the convert, as no convert made in the world was ever made by human means alone. The great aim of Bishops, Priests and Sisters is to sanctify and save the souls of Catholic children; that is their duty, and beyond this they leave the rest to God. If He desires the salvation of the soul of the child of an infidel, not all the influence in the world can prevent it, nor could all the influence of the congregated Sisterhood of the universe prevent it when an opportunity offers in Providence. Hence the alarm manifested by our pretended "True Catholic" is merely nightmare, superinduced by the success of our Catholic Convent Schools, and the failure of the farcical institutions under Protestant patronage.

The question with Protestant parents is whether they will have their daughters educated in institutions where the three "Fs" (fashion, folly and flippery) are the prominent principles imbibed by the pupils, or send them to schools controlled by Catholic Religious where they will be surrounded by an atmosphere of virtue, where they will be constantly under the care of spiritual mothers, where they will dwell in a peaceful seclusion as pure as paradise, and from which they are almost certain to emerge far better fitted to grace society and influence it by their virtue. To adopt the favorite expression of our criticised contributor of the Churchman—which horn of this dilemma will conscientious Protestant parents choose? Surely almost invariably above her virtuous dom by adopting the "horn of righteousness" possessed only by Catholic schools.

The New President.

Now that the mortuary ceremonies have been performed over the bier of the martyr GARFIELD, the public mind will anxiously seek to learn something of his successor CHESTER ALLAN ARTHUR, who is the second son of an Irish adopted citizen who has filled the Presidential chair. In order, therefore, that the readers of the MONITOR may be made familiar with the antecedents of the new incumbent in the White House, we append the following biographical sketch, compiled from reliable sources, promising it with the assurance that the rumor circulated regarding Mr. Arthur's ineligibility to fill the office of President in consequence of being an alien—had no foundation whatever.

Chester Allan Arthur was born in Fairfield, Franklin county, Vermont, October 5, 1830. He was named Chester, after Dr. Chester Abell, and Allan after his grandfather on his father's side. His father, William Arthur, was an itinerant Baptist preacher, born in county Antrim, Ireland, and educated at Belfast College. The young licentiate came at once to America, and here married and began his work, which, in a busy life ending October 27, 1875, led him to many pulpits in Vermont and New York, and to some in Canada, the town of Fairfield, Vt., being among them.

The early days of Chester A. Arthur's tuition were passed under the tutelage of his father. From his home studies he went to the wider field of instruction at Schenectady, N. Y., in the grammar school of which place he was prepared for entering Union College. At fifteen years of age, therefore, in 1845, he entered Union, and, after a regular course, graduated high in his class. Like many another ambitious but impecunious student, young Arthur taught school in the vacations of college specially provided for that purpose. It is a coincidence that in these days of sturdy struggle the young student from Union College and a young student (Garfield) from Williams both taught school in North-Pownal, Vt.

With $40 in his pocket, the fruit savings of a school-master's scanty pay, Arthur went to New York city and entered the law office of Hon. Erastus D. Culver, and was in 1854 admitted to the practice of law. But clients did not then flock to his standard, and, with a young legal friend in like circumstances and frame of mind, two brief-less young lawyers roamed the Western States for three months, seeking a place to locate. In the end, not satisfied with the advice of Greeley, the young men returned to New York and pooled their issues in the firm name of Arthur & Gardiner. About this time Mr. Arthur made a happy matrimonial alliance, marrying the only daughter of Lieutenant Herndon, U. S. N., the brave Herndon who went down with the Aspinwall steamship Central America, which he commanded. Mrs. Arthur died in January, 1880, leaving two children, a son now in his 16th and a daughter in her 10th year.

Relative to the rumors of charges brought against the new President as to his political preferments, we have only to say that the man deserves to be tried and heard in his defence ere he be condemned, and, while the partisans opposed to Mr. Arthur bring damaging charges against him, such a prizer as Rev. Dr. McGlynn, Rector of St. Stephen's church, New York, who has known the new President for many years, has publicly expressed himself as perfectly satisfied with the probity of the new President, and he feels that the country will be assured of its continued prosperity under the guiding genius of the new incumbent.

Ashamed of Pixley's Contemptible Act.

Our readers will no doubt share with us the pleasure we felt when we read the following manly disavowal of Pixley's meanness in the Chronicle of Wednesday last:

A MISTAKE CORRECTED.

As a Democratic meeting during the late municipal campaign a circular was publicly exhibited which gave the names, nationality and religious faith of the various candidates then before the public, and a Democratic speaker charged that this circular emanated from the Patriotic Sons of America. What was individual belonging to that or any other Order may have done—his own responsibility is not pertinent. The Chronicle is requested to drop the above charge and to state that the general laws of the Order referred to positively prohibit intermingling in political controversies. The purposes in view are quite different and are comprised in the encouragement of "free education, patriotism, obedience to the laws and fraternal fellowship," and in the perpetuation of "an American country and the American Union." There is scarcely a European nationality which is not represented in this city by a fraternal society having some cherished purpose in view. In like manner native citizens possess the right to form brotherly societies without being subject to petty partisan suspicion. The Chronicle order was totally misinformed.

We heartily congratulate the members of the Patriotic Sons of America that they are not the proscriptive fanatics Pixley so fraudulently painted them. We are also glad to learn that the Know-nothing element in the Republican party is confined to two individuals—Pixley and his mate. The former never did know much, and what little the latter knew died with him!

Catholic Army Chaplains.

For several years a general complaint has been made by the Catholic press of this country that no chaplains were provided for the thousands of Catholic soldiers in the United States army, yet nothing has been done to better the condition of Catholic soldiers in this respect. We are glad to learn from an English paper that such a state of affairs is not allowed to exist in the English army, and we print the method by which chaplains are provided for the troops therein, in the hope that a similar system may be imitated by the American Government.

The Marquis of Hartington, during a recent debate in the House of Lords, gave the following explanation of the manner in which Catholic chaplains are provided for the troops on the Indian service: "The arrangements for the performance of all religious services for the Catholic soldiery in India are made by the Archbishop or other ecclesiastical head of that Church. All the personal details are managed by him, and it is he who deputes the several priests for the duties. For this superintendence and for the maintenance of registers of marriages, burials, etc., in Catholic churches, he receives a monthly allowance from the State. The executive duties are paid for according to the number of Catholic soldiers and Government servants in the garrison. The priests employed on these duties are not appointed by the Government. They are thus on a totally different footing from Church of England or Presbyterian chaplains, inasmuch as they belong to no establishment, and are not Government servants, either convenanted or uncovenanted." It looks as if a similar plan might be feasible in this country, and we hope General Recruits will more in the matter when he represents this section of the State in the next Congress.

THE CONVERSION OF THE KING OF WURTEMBURG.

The rumor that the King of Wurtemburg has entered the Church, says the Paris Univers, is now reasserted. It is said that the abjuration was to take place in a chapel of a religious community at Cannes, where His Majesty has passed the winter. If this rumor prove true—and we give it with all reservation—this is not the first Scottish King who has returned to the Church as he forefathers. His great grand-uncle, Duke Charles (1735-1797), abjured the Lutheran heresy. The succession in the Protestant line will, on the death of the present king, fall on Prince William, who has no male descendants. It is supposed that it will then fall on the Catholic line.

The London correspondent of the Dublin Freeman says that Cardinal Manning will shortly visit Ireland.

Gambetta's New Game.

Now that Gambetta has once more been placed in power in France, he seems determined to perform the second act in the tragedy wherein the Catholic Church is to be crushed out of existence in a country which was once fondly called "the eldest daughter of the Church." The first act unfold with the expulsion of the Religious Orders, and we learn from recent dispatches that the Reds and Radicals of France have demanded that all the immense valuable real estate and improvements, which have been the property of the Religious Orders for centuries, shall be transferred to the State, the property sold, and the value thereof be turned into the public exchequer.

The value of the property thus to be stolen from the Church is estimated at from one hundred to one hundred and fifty millions of dollars, a sum that France will absorb into its capacious treasury, and then boast of the "progress" which it is making under the rule of its infidel rulers. The rightful owners are first dispossessed of their property and driven forth into exile, robbed of all their rights as French citizens. Then the Government seizes upon their homes, lands and personal estate, and appropriates them for its own financial benefit, and the wicked world looks on and smiles at the thievery, because the Catholic Church is made to suffer thereby. God, however, still reigns, and France will yet feel the effects of her folly.

It is also proposed by the Radicals to turn the proceeds of this gigantic robbery of Church property into a fund for pensioning those women who are left widows by the wholesale slaughter of the Communists, which will disparally them from performing labor. Truly a philanthropic idea to carry out upon ill-gotten plunder. And when this act of vandalism is consummated, it is proposed to compel the remaining clergy in France to serve in the army, to limit their numbers, and to abolish all the churches which the infidel French Government does not deem necessary for the "welfare" of the people. This is the programme of "progress," and the next step will be to recast the scenes of olden times, to erect an altar to Jupiter for worship of the Goddess of Reason. What will sense next, it is difficult to conjecture, but if the saying be true that history repeats itself, we may yet see France atone, in the last blood of her children, for the outrages which she has perpetrated against Christianity in the past, as well as those she contemplates at present. In the meantime, the reflection will force itself upon the minds of American Catholics that the Catholics of France must be a craven herds when they permit a few thoughtless and red-handed Radicals to rule roughshod over them in all their schemes of irreligion and robbery. There must be something wrong in the material of which French society is composed, when a few men rule the Church thus trampled on with impunity.

Crime in Ireland and England.

There was a tacit understanding that the Coercion Act was merely designed for the temporary maintenance of order pending the fundamental settlement of the Irish land question. But it seems that Mr. Forster still insists on applying this harsh measure, and on keeping persons arrested on suspicion in jail. The pretext for a course which is not calculated to fortify the confidence of the Irish people in the intentions of the Gladstone Government is the alleged prevalence of social disorder and agrarian violence. It is curious, in view of Mr. Forster's assertion, to compare the relative amount of crime in Ireland and England which have been lately collected for the Catholic World.

There is an almost impression current among English people that the Irish is a Celtic race, and, therefore, purity impelled to violence and disorder. It was the existence of this deep-rooted and wholly indefensible prejudice, which compelled Mr. Forster to carry through his Coercion bill. Yet Mr. Gladstone himself in 1870 asked the House of Commons to investigate and determine in which province of Ireland the ratio of agrarian crime to the number of ejectments was highest. They would find, he said, that in Connaught, where the Celtic race largely predominated, the ratio of agrarian outrages to evictions was far lower than in Ulster, which has the largest infusion of Anglo-Celtic blood. Equally prepossessing is the notion that the influence of the Catholic Church fails to actually arrest the criminal impulses of the Irish people. With a view of testing the effect of confession upon morals, an extensive inquiry was instituted some years ago by Dr. Forbes, one of the Queen's physicians, in regard to the number of illegitimate children in each of the four provinces of Ireland. It turned out that the proportion of children not born in wedlock considerably exceeded in Ulster the relative prevalence of the Catholic and Protestant religions in each province, being large where the Protestant element was large, and small where it was small. A similar inquiry in Presbyterian organ, the Scotsman, has admitted that in respect to offences against purity England was nearly twice, and Scotland almost three times, as bad as Ireland, and that in Ireland itself the ratio of illegitimacy was largest in the northeastern portion, which comprises the semi-English and Scotch plantations of Ulster.

Dr. Forbes, it may be said, admitting that Ireland is relatively free from transgressions of sexual morality, is not the case widely distributed? Is not the Irishman prone to commit homicide and attempts to kill? We can answer this question by contrasting the criminal statistics of England and Ireland in regard to all those serious offences against the person which are generally tried before a jury only. For this purpose the population of the last-named country should, of course, be compared with a proportionate fraction of the much denser population of England. We find, then, that of the crimes specified there were committed in 1878 in Ireland 2,886, and in England, for the same population, 4,186. This exhibit is bad enough for the latter nation, but Scotland is in a still less creditable condition, for here the judicial return, if we keep in view proportionate numbers, would foot up 5,925. As for murders, there were but five in Ireland during 1880, whereas in England four were reported in a single day of that year. It is astonishing, indeed, to note how great a decrease has taken place in the crime of homicide in Ireland within the last half century. In 1833 there were recorded no less than 172 homicides. There were 126 in 1846, the year before the great famine. But by 1852 the number had decreased to 69, and 1856 to 36. In 1876 there were only 18 homicides, 15 in 1877, and in 1879 but four. That so few murders were committed in 1880, when a land war raged, should be a great boon to the country to the verge of famine, is a striking comment on the long suffering spirit of the Irish.

The more the evidence supplied by criminal statistics is sifted, the more questions able appear the motives which prompted the Coercion act. It appears from a return presented to the House of Commons that in the thirteen months preceding Jan. 31, 1881, the whole number of agrarian offences of a more threatening character, was but 987, whereas in the year 1850, when no coercion act was demanded, the number of such outrages reached 1,329. It is known, moreover, that at the very time Mr. Forster was proclaiming the inadequacy of the ordinary tribunals and urging the necessity of stringent coercion, the reports of the Irish courts were remarkably satisfactory. At the summer assizes of 1880 the Judges in all parts of the country bore testimony to the comparative absence of crime. In Wexford there were only three cases to go before the Grand Jury, in Galway, the poorest and most disturbed county in the island, only four; in Wicklow, one; in Louth, two, in Kilkenny, two; in the city of Cork, three; in North Tipperary, a district noted for the excitable temper of the people, Judge Fitzgerald could find no fact that there was an agrarian outrages at all, and at Drogheda, Judge Fitzgibbon declared that the complete absence of crime was not in any way owing to the inability of the police authorities to detect it. So much for the much-boasted frequency of crimes against human beings. As to the charge of cruelty to animals, it was once a common argument frequently brought against Ireland since the beginning of the land agitation, this can be easily disposed of. For Charles Kingsley assigned as one reason for coercion that during the ten months preceding November, 1881, twenty-two cattle had been maimed in Ireland. Now, in England during the year 1879 no less than 3,726 convictions for cruelty to animals were had, including such atrocities as pulling the tongues out of the poor dumb brutes while alive, and pouring turpentine down dogs' throats.

The last argument to which those who defend coercion have recourse is the pretended impossibility of convicting criminals. It is said that the people in the Irish districts are so in sympathy with the criminal class, that juries will not find a verdict against them. But this is a mere fiction when they are tried for an offence against the peace. Yet almost at the very time when that event occurred some charges of murder were being tried in English courts, and in each case the trial resulted in an acquittal. Why might not the Irish press with equal show of justice have proclaimed on such evidence the miscarriage of English justice, and the inefficiency of the criminal law of England?

In view of facts like these, who can marvel at the bitter resentment provoked in Ireland by a Coercion act, passed by a Legislature in which Irish members do not constitute one-fifth of the whole number, an act, too, which empowers an alien Governor to imprison men on suspicion, and "deprives the Irish people of the right to bear arms, the previous privilege which Englishmen would defend with their life's blood."

EDITORIAL NOTES.

—An English writer says in the London Life: "Mr. Parnell, it is beginning to be reported, will, before the next session of Parliament, espouse a young English heiress, 'whose wealth is only surpassed by her sagelegric.' She met Mr. Parnell in society in Ireland during last Winter, it is said, and about a month ago took the remarkable course of writing to him offering her hand and fortune as the means towards the attainment of his political ends."

—Treasurer George Arthur Wellesley Stuart, of the Brooklyn Board of Education, was one of the most upright and estimable men that unusually moral city; but when it was found that his accounts were short over $200,000 he ran away. Even his fame name does not prevent people from making remarks about his name. No doubt this scamp with the stolen school funds is bitterly opposed to Catholics having any voice in the control of the public schools or the fund thereto belonging.

—It seems if we are to believe the dispatches—that Canon Campillo skjured "in order to bring about a reform of Papacy, and to obtain recognition of the right of the Catholic clergy and people to vote at the election of the Pope, but the policy of Pope Leo XIII, has caused him to lose all hope." The best reform the recanting Canon can undertake is to reform himself. The time has gone by when the election of a Pope can be entrusted to the people. There are too many weeds like Campello in the Pope's garden and the sooner they are cast out into the devil's ditch outside the better it will be for the purity of the Church of Christ.

—Some of the most ludicrous mistakes in the literary world are made by the English papers when they undertake to speak of American affairs. Here is the London Standard's version of how Arthur was sworn into the Vice Presidency and it is funny enough for the columns of Punch: It says, "As far as England is concerned, we have no particular reason to congratulate ourselves on the inauguration of Mr. Arthur.

—He owes his election to Irish votes. In New York his constant associates were Fenians." England must be badly scared when it attributes such power to the staff-officers of the Irish in America.

—By the P. M. S. S. Australia we have Honolulu exchanges to September 28th. We make the following extract: On Tuesday, September 20th, at 11 o'clock a. m., her Royal Highness the Princess Regent received at Iolani Palace the Right Rev. Dr. Hermann, Bishop of Olba, consecrated lately in the city, and who enters upon the duties of Coadjutor Bishop to Count Right Reverend Louis Maigret, Bishop of Arathea and Vicar Apostolic.

Pixley says that the members of the Irish National Land League will be present at the funeral pageant of President Garfield in this city made "asses" of themselves for appearing as a distinct organization on that occasion. The brutal bigot should remember, however, that

The sons who such a remark would pass
Write himself down an egregious ass,
The kind of manners should go to school
To some intelligent Mexican mule!

Last week, the not always trustworthy cable, informed us of the defection from the Faith of one "Monsignor Ricci, the Canon of St. Peter's." There are many canons at St. Peter's, but if indeed this one unfortunate man has really apostatized and "joined the Methodists because of the Pope's attitude toward Italy," he assigns a very poor reason for his sorry conduct. We are now patiently awaiting the name of the Delilah who seduced this supposed apostate. There is always a woman at the bottom of such escapes and her name will crop out shortly in this case.

—The following are the particulars of the visit recently paid by Archbishop Croke and Bishop Fitzgerald to Michael Davitt at Portland prison. As a special favor, they were permitted to have their interview with Davitt in the Governor's private room, and of course the founder of the Land League was greatly overjoyed at seeing the two patriotic prelates. The interview lasted a considerable time, as the participators in it had many important matters to talk over in relation to the outlook in Ireland. Davitt was delighted to hear from the Archbishop that the prospects of the harvest in the old country were promising, and the news of Mr. John Dillon's release from prison, which he then heard for the first time, was hailed by him with unfeigned pleasure. Perhaps the most vitally important subject touched upon in the course of the interview was the Land Bill. There was a lengthy interchange of opinion in regard to it, Davitt expressing himself much pleased with many of its provisions, though of course no, receiving it as anything but an installment of justice. As to his own life in prison, Davitt told his visitors that everything was done that was in authority in the building to make prison life tolerable to him. The Governor has provided him with books and writing material, of which favors he greatly avails himself, whilst for exercise he is allowed to walk in the prison yard, enjoying a pretty garden which he has all to himself. He lives entirely apart from the other inmates of the prison, and he is thus spared the degrading association so revolting to a man of Davitt's high sterling temperament. The Bishops found the father of the Land League in as good health as could be expected. The climate is equable and sufficiently mild even in Winter to allow geraniums and myrtles to flourish in the open air. Yet by the one little incident of the news of Dillion's release was a flood of light let in upon the terrible loneliness and isolation of the prisoner of Portland; and the poor fellow's joy, when he heard that, after all, the harvest prospects are not black, promises more than volumes could, the well of love for his country and his country men whose springs lie deep in the heart of Michael Davitt.

DEATH OF A PIONEER PRIEST.

Another of the pioneer priests of this country has passed away, on Thursday, Sept. 15th, the Rev. Father Fitton, rector of the Church of Our Most Holy Redeemer, East Boston, died in the 79th year of his age. Four years ago he celebrated the golden jubilee of his ordination to the priesthood. He has been for some time past in failing health, and his death at this time was somewhat unexpected, as he had recently left Boston for the East for a few months, and had not been confined to bed until a few days before his death.

Father Fitton's life was a series of the history of the Church in this country. He was one of the deceased priest had aptly been called the representative priest of New England. He was born in the year 1802 in Boston, of English parents. His father was a native of Lancashire, and his mother of Wales, and he was one member of the first Catholic congregation in Boston, numbering scarcely a hundred, and worshipping in the little Huguenot structure—in School st., where the present church stood a few years since. There, where the devoted band of French, Irish and American Catholics were gathered by Father Thayer, in the last decade of the eighteenth century, Father Fitton's parents were married. On Sep Wednesday, April 14th, 1805, he was baptized by the Rev. Dr. Matignon, who came to assist and succeed Father Thayer. At the age of five he was confirmed by Bishop Cheverus from whom he had from the fact that there were 94 baptisms and 32 deaths that year.

THE POPE AND GERMANY.

The Roman correspondent of the Manchester Guardian, writing from Rome says: "Prince Bismarck's agent, M. Kurt Schlozer, has been in Rome for the last few days, and he has had frequent interviews with Cardinal Jacobini. The Pope, too, has received him twice in private audience, and it is not improbable that the modus vivendi between the Vatican and the Berlin Government will soon be an accomplished fact. The basis of the negotiations is the old story of submitting the action on both sides at the time of the nomination of bishops and views general for appointment of vacant sees. The Pope, in return, is to be conducted canonically, a list being sent up to the Government periodically of all parish priests and vicars holding the cure of souls. On the other hand, the Government will realize that the Ultra-Catholic party in Germany has been guilty of further patronage, and there will be no more spiteful intrusion into the affairs of priests who probably never had any vocation for their ministry, and whose sole title to promotion was the fact that they were at loggerheads with their lawful superiors. The Pope, William has always refused to revive Bishop Reinkens, the chief prelate of the new sect, and nobody will regret more over the success of the negotiations than the stately pious monarch, whose last offer of a Bishopric to Dr. Reinkens was to the effect that the Empress is a strong patroness of the Old Catholics, and that Catholic subjects who were so ready to spill their blood for the unity of Germany as others."

—It is believed that at the coming Consistory, at which many bishops of the world will be invited to witness the solemn act of canonization, the Holy Father will publish a declaration of the world setting forth the present unquestionable position of the Head of the Church. The order will be sent to the Pope's foreign representatives and laid before their respective Governments to-

DEATH OF FATHER KAISER.

The numerous friends and acquaintances of Rev. H. J. KAISER, will be both surprised and sorrowful at the news of his death, which was announced by a telegram to Archbishop Alemany yesterday. Father Kaiser had been for some time in failing health, and went East a few months ago, with the hope that the trip would reinforce his system. Physicians where he consulted advised a trip to Europe and Father Kaiser was almost to embark for that purpose when he was attacked by a severe cold which developed into erysipelas, of which he died on last Sunday at the hospital of St. Francis, Jersey city, N. J.

Father Kaiser was well known throughout this city and State, having been built by him the Benifacio's church in this city, and its Rector for many years. He was also Rector of the Mission San Jose, where he was officiating prior to his departure East.

His Grace Archbishop Alemany will celebrate Pontifical Requiem Mass for the repose of the soul of Father Kaiser at St. Boniface church, Tyler street, on next Tuesday at 9 a. m., at which a large number of the Rev. Clergy and laity will attend.

We ask of our readers a remembrance in their prayers for the deceased priest.

CONCERT IN AID OF FATHER CULLEN'S CHURCH.

On next Tuesday evening, the 11th inst., a select vocal and instrumental Concert will be given in Opera Hall, corner Geary and Larkin streets, for the purpose of raising funds whereWith to pay the mortgage, interest, etc., of possible, to pay off a portion of the debt resting on the venerable edifice known as St. John the Baptist's church, Eddy street. Whatever Father Cullen undertakes he does well; hence he has engaged some of the best talent in the city for his forthcoming concert. The celebrated string band from St. Mary's College have volunteered their services and we predict that all who attend will receive the worth of their money, as well as contribute towards one of the best objects that can test practical charity. The tickets are only fifty cents. Select your partner, procure your ticket, and participate in the pleasure of doing a great deal of good at a very small investment. The management of the entertainment has been gratefully entrusted to the experienced hands of Mrs. Virginia, Nippert, Organist.

ST. IGNATIUS SUNDAY SCHOOL.

On Wednesday evening next there will be a lit erary and musical entertainment given in the large hall of St. Ignatius College, for the purpose of raising a fund wherewith to purchase books for the children attending the Sunday School attached to the Church. The girls' school was marvelously good, and, as the result, the hall was crowded to its utmost capacity. The boys' school, though not quite so numerous, was equally

How to Break off Bad Habits.

Understand the reason, and all the reasons, why the habit is injurious. Study the subject until there is no lingering doubt in your mind. Avoid the places, the persons and the thoughts that lead to the temptation. Frequent the places, associate with the persons, indulge the thoughts that lead away from temptation. Keep busy. Idleness is the strength of bad habits. Do not give up the struggle when you have broken your resolution once, twice, a thousand times. That only shows how much need there is for you to strive. When you have broken your resolution, just think the matter over, and endeavor to understand why it was you failed, so that you may be on your guard against a recurrence of the same circumstances. Do you think it is an easy thing that you have undertaken. It is folly to expect to break off a habit in a day which may have been gathering strength in you for years.

Simple Health Remedy.

Most people know the benefit of lemonade before breakfast, but few know how it is more than doubled by taking it at night also. The way to get the better of a bilious system without blue pills or quinine, is to take the juice of one, two, or three lemons, as the appetite craves, in as much water as to make it pleasant to drink, with sugar, before going to bed. In the morning on rising, or at least half an hour before breakfast, take the juice of one lemon in a goblet of water. This will clear the system of humors and bile, with mild efficacy, without any of the weakening effects of Congress water. People should not irritate the stomach by eating the lemon clear; the powerful acid of the juice, which is almost corrosive, infallibly produces inflammation after a while; but properly diluted, so that it does not burn or draw the throat, it does its full medicinal work without harm, and when the stomach is clear of food has abundant opportunity to work the system thoroughly.

Babies Need Water.

An old physician relates his experience with a sick child, to which he was called. It was crying and struggling and the mother in reply to a query said she could not remember when she had given it any water—that she seldom did so and did not know that it needed any. The doctor called for gold water, gave the infant a few teaspoonfuls, and it was relieved of all its trouble, stopped crying and sank peacefully to sleep in its mother's arms. Let this be a reminder to mothers and nurses. Infants who nurse at the breast may often suffer as much from the want of water as adults who eat more solid food. Often when a child cries it is only thirst which causes it.

Flattery Does No Good.

Catherine II. of Russia wrote to Baron Grimm to be sparing of his flattery. "Praise," she declared, "has never done any good. But whenever people have spoken ill of me, then, with a noble assurance I have sometimes said to myself: "I will be revenged upon them; I will show them what liars they are."

For Whitewash.

A subscriber asks for a receipe for whitewash. That used on the President's mansion has a wide celebrity, and is as follows: "One half a bushel of quick-lime, slaked with boiling water. Cover it during the process to keep in the steam. Strain the liquid through a seive, and add to it a peck of salt dissolved in warm water and three pounds of ground rice boiled to a thin paste. Stir in, boiling hot, one-half pound of Spanish whiting, one pound of white glue, and five gallons of hot water. Let the liquid stand a few days, and apply with a mixtume brush.

Keeping Apples.
